BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

Second Thoughts On Music

Bach-Mozart Concerts Tanglewood Attraction

First Two Week Ends to Feature Traditional Programs; Chamber Music On Wednesday Nights; Full Orchestra to Start July 24

By WILLARD M. CLARK

This column is directed to the many people who have requested information about the programs to be given during the Berkshire Music Festival in Tanglewood and with the hope that others will find some of the programs enough to their liking to make the journey to Tanglewood where the finest music is superbly played amid ideal surroundings. The festival opens July 1 and while Charles Munch will conduct the majority of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he has invited the venerable and beloved Pierre Monteux to share the podium with him.

A distinguished list of soloists has been engaged. These include Rudolf Serkin and Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, pianists; Isaac Stern, violinist; Bethany Beardslee and Adele Addison, sopranos; Florence Kopleff, alto; James McCollum and Blake Stern, tenors, and Donald Gramm, bass. Also appearing will be Lukas Foss, Bernard Zighera and Ralph Berkowitz, pianists; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flutist; Ralph Gomberg, oboeist, and Ruth Posselt, violinist. Hugh Ross will be choral director.

Chamber Music Series

The chamber music series opens the festival Wednesday night, July 1 when the Kroll String Quartet will be heard in the Beethoven Quartet Op. 18, No. 2; Prokofieff's Quartet, Op. 50, and Dvorak's Quartet Op. 51. The series will continue each Wednesday night, with all concerts being given in the theater at 8:30 p. m. On July 8, the New York Pro Musica will give a program devoted to the works of Monteverdi. The Beaux Arts Trio of New York will be heard July 15 playing the Mozart Trio in G major; Saint-Saens' Trio, Op. 18; Copland's "Vitebak" and Beethoven's Trio Op. 70, No. 2. July 22, the Bel Arte Trio, assisted by Ralph Berkowitz, pianist, will play Beethoven's Trio, Op. 9, No. 3; a trio by Rivier and the Brahms Piano Quartet, Op. 25. Alexander Schneider, violinist, and Leon Kirchner, pianist, will play works by Mozart and Kirchner the evening of July 29 and the series will close with another concert by the Kroll String Quartet Aug. 5, when the program will be composed of three Beethoven Quartets, Op. 18, No. 3 Op. 22 and Op. 51, No. 2.

The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will play each Thursday night in the shed, beginning July 2 and concluding July 30. Thursday, August 6 will be "Tanglewood-on-Parade," featuring Arthur Fiedler and the Pops Orchestra. These concerts by the Music Center Orchestra are particularly interesting, as they are led by student conductors who offer a fine array of contemporary and standard works of the orchestral repertoire.

Bach-Mozart Concerts

Ever since Serge Koussevitzky inaugurated them, the concerts devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart have found a distinguished audience. Given in the theater, they provide much music that is not usually heard and the small, hand-picked group of players can hardly be equaled.

The first of these concerts will be given July 3 and the program will open with the Bach "Brandenburg" Concerto No. 3; his Suite No. 2 in which flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer will be featured; the "Musical Offering" and finally, the "Cantata" No. 50 sung by the Tanglewood Choir. Let us hope Hugh Ross has some good material to work with.

Saturday, July 4, the program will be devoted to Bach's concertos for one, two and three pianos. Pianists will include Lukas Foss, Bernard Zinghera and Ralph Berkowitz. On Saturday, July 5, Mr. Munch will offer the Bach "Brandenburg" Concerto No. 6, the Cantata No. 51, with Bethany Beardslee, soprano; the violin and oboe concerto, featuring Posselt and Gomberg and Suite No. 3.

Three concerts devoted to the music of Mozart open Friday, July 10. This program will open with the overture to "Don Giovanni." Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer will play the piano concerto K.453. The program also includes a Divertimento and closes with the "Haffner" symphony. On July 11 the program will be devoted to three Mozart symphonies, including the "Jupiter."

As Charles Munch chooses them, three symphonies in one evening do not seem too many. The final concert in this Bach-Mozart series will be Saturday, July 12. The program will open with the "Prague" symphony and the remainder of the program will be devoted to a performance of the "Requiem." Soloists will be Addison, Kopleff, Stern and Gramm.

The Shed Concerts

The shed concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux start Friday, July 24. The first program includes the Bach-Resphigi "Passacaglia"; Brahms violin concerto with Isaac Stern; Brahms-Thomson Chorale Prelude and Strauss "Don Juan." Pierre Monteux will conduct. Saturday, July 25, Charles Munch will conduct Brahms "Academic" overture, Piston's Symphony No. 3 and Brahms' first symphony. Sunday afternoon, July 26, Mr. Munch will conduct Brahms' Haydn "Variations," Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2, Rudolf Serkin pianist, and Aaron Copland will conduct his own "Tender Land" suite.

The annual Koussevitzky Memorial concert will be given July 31, when Mozart's "Requiem" will be heard. On Aug. 1 Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony and first piano concerto will be heard, the latter with Rudolf Serkin as soloist: Schumann's "Manfred" will be played by the orchestra and his "Concert Piece" will have Serkin as soloist. The program will conclude with "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." Pierre Monteux will conduct. On Aug. 2, Charles Munch will offer the fourth symphony by Tcherepnin, the Schumann second symphony, and Isaac Stern will be soloist in the Mendelssohn violin concerto.

On Aug. 4, an all-Beethoven program will be given. This will feature the fourth symphony, the "Choral Fantasy" with piano, and Rudolf Serkin playing the fourth piano concerto. Pierre Monteux will direct another all-Beethoven program Aug. 8, offering Symphonies No. 5 and 6 and the "Fidelio" overture. The final concert will offer the traditional ninth symphony by Beethoven. The soloists will be Addison, Kopleff, Stern and Gramm. The concert opens with the "Coriolan" overture.

Second Thoughts On Music

Bach-Mozart Concerts Tanglewood Attraction

First Two Week Ends to Feature Traditional Programs; Chamber Music On Wednesday Nights; Full Orchestra to Start July 24

By WILLARD M. CLARK

This column is directed to the many people who have requested information about the programs to be given during the Berkshire Music Festival in Tanglewood and with the hope that others will find some of the programs enough to their liking to make the journey to Tanglewood where the finest music is superbly played amid ideal surroundings. The festival opens July 1, and while Charles Munch will conduct the majority of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he has invited the venerable and beloved Pierre Monteux to share the podium with him.

A distinguished list of soloists has been engaged. These include Rudolf Serkin and Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, pianists; Isaac Stern, violinist; Bethany Beardslee and Adele Addison, sopranos; Florence Kopleff, alto; James McCollum and Blake Stern, tenors, and Donald Gramm, bass. Also appearing will be Lukas Foss, Bernard Zighera and Ralph Berkowitz, pianists; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flutist; Ralph Gomberg, oboeist, and Ruth Posselt, violinist. Hugh Ross will be choral director.

Chamber Music Series

The chamber music series opens the festival Wednesday night, July 1 when the Kroll String Quartet will be heard in the Beethoven Quartet Op. 18, No. 2, Prokofieff's Quartet Op. 50, and Dvorak's Quartet Op. 51. The series will continue each Wednesday night, with all concerts being given in the theater at 8:30 p. m. On July 8, the New York Pro Musica will give a program devoted to the works of Monteverdi. The Beaux Arts Trio of New York will be heard July 15 playing the Mozart Trio in G major; Saint-Saens' Trio, Op. 18; Copland's "Vitebsk" and Beethoven's Trio Op. 70, No. 2. July 22, the Bel Arte Trio, assisted by Ralph Berkowitz, pianist, will play Beethoven's Trio, Op. 9, No. 3; a trio by Rivier and the Brahms Piano Quartet, Op. 25. Alexander Schneider, violinist, and Leon Kirchner, pianist, will play works by Mozart and Kirchner the evening of July 29 and the series will close with another concert by the Kroll String Quartet Aug. 5, when the program will be composed of three Beethoven Quartets, Op. 18, No. 3 Op. 22 and Op. 51, No. 2.

The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will play each Thursday night in the shed, beginning July 2 and concluding July 30. Thursday, August 6 will be "Tanglewood-on-Parade," featuring Arthur Fiedler and the Pops Orchestra. These concerts by the Music Center Orchestra are particularly interesting, as they are led by student conductors who offer a fine array of contemporary and standard works of the orchestral repertoire.

Bach-Mozart Concerts

Ever since Serge Koussevitzky inaugurated them, the concerts devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart have found a distinguished audience. Given in the theater, they provide much music that is not usually heard and the small, hand-picked group of players can hardly be equaled.

The first of these concerts will be given July 3 and the program will open with the Bach "Brandenburg" Concerto No. 3; his Suite No. 2 in which flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer will be featured; the "Musical Offering" and finally, the "Cantata" No. 50 sung by the Tanglewood Choir. Let us hope Hugh Ross has some good material to work with.

Saturday, July 4, the program will be devoted to Bach's concertos for one, two and three pianos. Pianists will include Lukas Foss, Bernard Zinghera and Ralph Berkowitz. On Saturday, July 5, Mr. Munch will offer the Bach "Brandenburg" Concerto No. 6, the Cantata No. 51, with Bethany Beardslee, soprano; the violin and oboe concerto, featuring Posselt and Gomberg and Suite No. 3.

Three concerts devoted to the music of Mozart open Friday, July 10. This program will open with the overture to "Don Giovanni." Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer will play the piano concerto K.453. The program also includes a Divertimento and closes with the "Haffner" symphony. On July 11 the program will be devoted to three Mozart symphonies, including the "Jupitor."

As Charles Munch chooses them, three symphonies in one evening do not seem too many. The final concert in this Bach-Mozart series will be Saturday, July 12. The program will open with the "Prague" symphony and the remainder of the program will be devoted to a performance of the "Requiem." Soloists will be Addison, Kopleff, Stern and Gramm.

The Shed Concerts

The shed concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux start Friday, July 24. The first program includes the Bach-Resphigi "Passacaglia"; Brahms violin concerto with Isaac Stern; Brahms-Thomson Chorale Prelude and Strauss "Don Juan." Pierre Monteux will conduct. Saturday, July 25, Charles Munch will conduct Brahms "Academic" overture, Piston's Symphony No. 3 and Brahms' first symphony. Sunday, afternoon, July 26, Mr. Munch will conduct Brahms' Haydn "Variations," Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2, Rudolf Serkin pianist, and Aaron Copland will conduct his own "Tender Land" suite.

The annual Koussevitzky Memorial concert will be given July 31, when Mozart's "Requiem" will be heard. On Aug. 1 Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony and first piano concerto will be heard, the latter with Rudolf Serkin as soloist: Schumann's "Manfred" will be played by the orchestra and his "Concert Piece" will have Serkin as soloist. The program will conclude with "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." Pierre Monteux will conduct. On Aug. 2, Charles Munch will offer the fourth symphony by Tcherepnin, the Schumann second symphony, and Isaac Stern will be soloist in the Mendelssohn violin concerto.

On Aug. 4 an all-Beethoven program will be given. This will feature the fourth symphony, the "Choral Fantasy" with piano, and Rudolf Serkin playing the fourth piano concerto. Pierre Monteux will direct another all-Beethoven program Aug. 8, offering Symphonies No. 5 and 6 and the "Fidelio" overture. The final concert will offer the traditional ninth symphony by Beethoven. The soloists will be Addison, Kopleff, Stern and Gramm. The concert opens with the "Coriolan" overture.

The Lively Arts—

Tanglewood Previews Its Concert Season

By T. H. Parker

If one listens intently at this season of the year he can hear between the robin's persistent song and the convertible's radio blast, what seems to be the horns of Elfland faintly blowing. Actually it is the Boston Symphony tuning up for the summer concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, accompanied by the orchestra's able publicity drumbeaters.

In fact, the calendar of events for the upcoming Tanglewood season, which will run from July 1 to August 9, is already being mailed out. Once again there will be a series of chamber music performances on Wednesday evenings, though the programs for the individual concerts have not yet been revealed. There will also be three concerts devoted to the music of Bach and three more to Mozart. And finally, beginning on Friday, July 17, Saturday, July 18, and Sunday, July 19, and continuing for the three following week ends, there will be the main concerts of the Festival.

Because this seems to be the table of events about which most inquiry is made all summer long, we publish the dates and programs here for your convenience. Once again, please paste them in your hat or wherever you can refer to them most easily, as we probably will not be able to reprint them in toto.

As we say, you'll have to wait to hear about the chamber music programs. The Bach concerts, played by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony, open Friday, July 3. At 8:30 o'clock that evening, you may hear the Brandenburg Concerto No. 3; Suite No. 2; and the Cantata No. 50 with the Festival Chorus. Then:

Saturday, July 4, 8:30—Bach's Concertos for one, two, three and four pianos.

Sunday, July 5, at 2:30 (note!) — Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 6; Cantata 51; Violin and Oboe Concerto with Ruth Posselt and Ralph Gomberg; and the Suite No. 3.

The Mozart concerts come the following week end:

Friday, July 10, 8:30—Overture to "Don Giovanni;" Piano Concerto K453, with Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer; Divertimento K287; and the "Haffner" Symphony.

Saturday, July 11, 8:30—Symphonies No. 39 in E Flat and No. 40 in G Minor, and the "Jupiter" Symphony.

Sunday, July 12, at 2:30 —The "Prague" Symphony; the Requiem K626, with Adele Addison, Florence Kopleff, Blake Stern, Donald Gramm, and the Festival Chorus.

The main concerts open the subsequent week end:

Friday, July 17, 8:30 — "Corsair" Overture, Berlioz; "Parables," Martinu; Symphony No. 6, Tschaikowsky.

Saturday, July 18, 8:30—"Oberon" Overture, Weber; Symphony of Chorales, Lukas Foss, with the composer conducting; and the Tschaikowsky Violin Concerto, Isaac Stern, soloist.

Sunday, July 19, at 2:30—Introduction and March, "Coq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy; Symphony on a Mountain Air, D'Indy, with Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer as pianist; and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 5. Pierre Monteux will conduct this performance.

Friday, July 24, 8:30—Passacaglia, Bach-Respighi; Violin Concerto, Brahms, Mr. Stern soloist; Brahms' Choral Preludes; "Don Juan," Strauss. Mr. Monteux will also conduct this program.

Saturday, July 25, 8:30—Academic Festival Overture, Brahms; Symphony No. 3, Piston; and Brahms' First Symphony.

Sunday, July 26, at 2:30 — Haydn Variations, Brahms; "Tender Land" Suite, Copland; Piano Concerto No. 1, Brahms, with Rudolf Serkin, soloist.

Friday, July 31, 8:30—Berlioz' Requiem, with John McCollum, tenor, and the Festival Chorus.

Saturday, August 1, 8:30—"Italian" Symphony, Mendelssohn; Piano Concerto No. 1, Mendelssohn, with Mr. Serkin as soloist; "Tristan" Prelude, Wagner; and Schumann's Fourth Symphony. Mr. Monteux will conduct.

Sunday, August 2, at 2:30 — Flemish Rhapsody, Roussel; Violin Concerto, Mendelssohn, with Mr. Stern as soloist; and Schumann's Symphony No. 2.

And finally, in the stretch, Friday, August 7, 8:30—Beethoven's Symphony No. 4; Choral Fantasy with Piano; and the Piano Concerto No. 4, with Mr. Serkin as soloist.

Saturday, August 8, 8:30—Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture, and Symphonies Nos. 6 and 5. Mr. Monteux will take this one.

Sunday, August 9, at 2:30—Beethoven's "Carioian" Overture, and (you'll never guess) his Ninth Symphony, with Miss Addison and Miss Kopleff, and Mr. Stern and Mr. Gramm.

With six infrequently-heard works out of a repertoire of 35 to be performed in the main concerts, the Berkshire Music Festival will not have much to offer the jaded concertgoer. But to everyone else, a good Tanglewood and hold your own tickets.

Parker Series Concert At LSTC March 15

By ALFRED BURKE

LOWELL—The final concert in this season's Moses Greeley Parker Lecture series will be given in the Little Theater at Lowell State Teachers college on Sunday afternoon, March 15, at 3:15 o'clock by Paul Bregor, pianist.

Prof. Bregor who is a faculty member at LTC in the department of music, will offer a program in the accepted tradition. Those who attended his first Lowell concert three seasons ago accorded him a tremendous reception and from indications his concert should attract the largest audience of the current season in the series.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY orchestra will make its fifth and final trip to New York in the coming week. Charles Munch will conduct concerts in Northampton, New Haven and Baltimore as well as in Brooklyn and New York.

Following the orchestra's return to Boston, Dr. Munch has invited the associate conductor, Richard Burgin, to conduct the concerts of Friday afternoon, March 20, at 2:15 o'clock, and Saturday evening, March 21, at 8:30. Mr. Burgin's program will include Beethoven's String Quartet, No. 15, in A minor, Op. 132, played by the entire string section of the orchestra, Stravinsky's Symphony in C, and "Till Eulenspiegel" by Richard Strauss. The Symphony in C was performed by the Boston Symphony in 1941 and again in 1944, conducted on both occasions by the composer.

Dr. Munch has announced plans for the orchestra's 1959 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox. The festival will open on Wednesday, July 1, and close on Sunday, August 9. Charles Munch will conduct 14 of the 18 festival concerts and Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's 84-year-old "conductor emeritus," will conduct four concerts, one on each of the last four week-ends.

THE ORCHESTRA WILL PLAY, with Dr. Munch conducting, Monday evening at Smith college. Included in the list of selections will be the Strauss Symphonia Domestica, Bloch's Schelmo, with Samuel Mayes, cellist, and as the opening work on the program, "Royal Hunt and Storm" from The Trojans by Berlioz.

A fine program is scheduled on Sunday, March 15, at the college when two performances of the Faure "Requiem" will be sung by members of the Harvard and Smith musical clubs. Eleanor Jackson, soprano, and Thomas Beveridge, bass, will be the soloists.

The [illegible] Federation of Music Teachers in co-operation with the National Piano Guild are naming committees in regards to the regional auditions which will be held at Lowell State Teachers college late in the spring.

Recording Choices

Edgard Varese's "Arcana" and Wayne Peterson's "Free Variations for Orchestra" are the choices of the American International Music Fund, Inc., for commercial recording in the second season of its Recording Guarantee Project. Eighteen American orchestras submitted tapes of thirty-seven works to a jury composed of Carlos Chavez, composer and conductor; Alfred Frankenstein, music and art critic of "The San Francisco Chronicle," and Douglas Moore, chairman of Columbia University's music department.

The selected works will be recorded by the orchestras which submitted them, the New York Philharmonic under Leonard Bernstein and the Minneapolis Symphony under Antal Dorati.

The tapes, made by the participating orchestras in their regular concerts this season between Oct. 15 and Feb. 15, will be placed in the Library of Congress in Washington and the Public Libraries of New York, Cincinnati, Dallas, Los Angeles and Minneapolis.

8:30 or 8?

To see how its subscribers liked the idea, the New York Philharmonic let it be known ten days ago that it was considering an 8 o'clock start for its Thursday night concerts next season. Letters received by the management thus far show a large majority in favor of retaining the present 8:30 beginning.

Tanglewood To Open Music Festival July 1

By FREDERICK J. KOUNTZ

What with opera in Cleveland, May Festivals in Ann Arbor, and like matters in other places, it is not too early to think about the Berkshire Festival.

The annual summer season of the Boston Orchestra at Tanglewood, which is in the heart of the Massachusetts hills just the distance of a pleasant walk from Lenox, will open this year on July 1.

On that evening, and every Wednesday evening through Aug. 5, there will be a chamber music concert. Beginning on July 3, which is a Friday, and thereafter on every Friday and Saturday evening and every Sunday afternoon the Boston Orchestra will be playing concerts.

Small Orchestra Programs Set

The first week of concerts will be devoted to Bach, the second to Mozart. These are the concerts in which only a small orchestra is generally employed and which are played for the most part in a pleasant structure called the Concert Theatre.

For years these concerts have been in the way of an introduction to the concerts for full orchestra which are played in an unusual structure called the Shed.

The first week of the big orchestra concerts will be concerned primarily with Tchaikowsky. That will be July 17, 18, and 19. During the following week, July 24, 25, and 26, Brahms will be the chief musical commodity.

Then on July 31, Aug. 1 and 2, there will be a Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Schumann span. And the final week will be all Beethoven.

Charles Munch will conduct all the concerts except those of July 19 and 24 and Aug. 8. Affairs of those dates will be in the hands of Pierre Monteux.

During the Brahms week Rudolf Serkin will play the Piano Concerto No. 1. This is the same concerto which he lately played in Cleveland with the Cleveland Orchestra and which he will play in the May Festival in Ann Arbor with the Philadelphia Orchestra. The date of the performance in Tanglewood will be Sunday, July 26.

The office of the Berkshire Festival is at Symphony Hall In Boston until June 16 after which date it will move to Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

Summer School Operated

The Berkshire Music Center, the summer school which is operated by the Boston Orchestra at Tanglewood, will open Sunday, June 29, and run through [illegible] 9. In the school there will be maintained again departments of conducting, of orchestra and chamber music, of choral music, and of composition.

The opera department will be traveling in Europe.

There are many available tuition plans and prizes at the Tanglewood School. Information about all of them may be obtained from Symphony Hall In Boston.

Music Lowell Sun March 59

Piano Recital To End Parker Series

By Alfred W. Burke

LOWELL—One of the outstanding events of the current season is scheduled for tomorrow afternoon at 3 o'clock in the Little theater at Lowell State Teachers college, when Prof. Paul Bregor of the school's department of music presents a piano recital. The concert will be the final program in the 1958-59 Moses Greeley Parker Lecture series.

Aside from his work in the field of teaching, Prof. Bregor has achieved notable success in the field of concert recital. He has been heard throughout the east. He made his debut recital locally two seasons ago. His program for tomorrow lists selections by Beethoven, Bach, Brahms, Chopin and Debussy.

The Broadway musical hit, "Carousel" will be presented by the MENC chapter and the Drama club of LTC in May. The production will be given three nights at the Little theater and is scheduled for May 14-15-16. John A. Coe will direct. Prof. Kalervo Kansanniva is director of scenic execution and lights; Robert Knoop, '59, is musical director and the co-producers are Colleen Moynihan, 59, and Dr. Domenic R. Procopio of the music department faculty at the college.

THERE WILL BE A rather large list of first nighters from Lowell on the occasion of the Metropolitan Opera company's Boston season which will open on Monday evening, April 13 and continue through Sunday afternoon, April 19. On the agenda, for first nighters is the now famous American opera, "Vanessa."

The spotlight will be focused on the brilliant young Lowell artist, Rosalind Elias, who achieved almost overnight fame in her first performance in "Vanessa". She will be rejoined by the members who made up the original cast.

The combined talents of Samuel Barber and Gian-Carlo Menotti have given the Met repertoire one of the very few American scores that has survived more than a season. One of the amazing factors concerning this opera is the element of two famous composers combining their talents into an individual work.

However, aside from this the opera offers nothing American in its setting. The opera is set in a "northern country" and is dated in the year 1905. Joining Miss Elias in the cast will be the original members, Steber, Resnik, Gedda, Tozzi, Cehanovsky and Nagay. Ignace Strasfogel will conduct.

RICHARD BURGIN, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra will conduct the concerts on Friday afternoon, March 20 and Saturday evening, March 21. His program will include Beethoven's String Quartet in A minor, Op. 132 (performed by the string orchestra); Stravinsky's Symphony in C and Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".

The same program will be rehearsed at the sixth in the series of open rehearsals on Thursday evening.

Dr. Charles Munch, director of the orchestra, has announced plans for the 1959 Berkshire Festival which will be held at Tanglewood, Lenox, from Wednesday, July 1, and close on Sunday, Aug. 9.

The director will conduct 14 of the 18 Festival concerts and Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's 84-year-old "conductor emeritus" will conduct four concerts, one on each of the last four week-ends.

The last four weekends will follow a plan of previous years, featuring the works of the great composers, combined with contemporary works. The opening weekend will give especial prominence to music by Tchaikovsky (July 17-18-19) and the following weeks to Brahms (July 24-25-26). Composers of the Romantic Period, including Berlioz, Mendelsshon and Schuman (July 31-August 1-2), and Beethoven (August 7-8-9). Among the contemporary composers whose works will be performed are Bohuslav Martinu, Lukas Foss, Walter Piston and Aaron Copland. Messrs. Copland and Foss will each conduct their own works.

Dr. Munch will present three great works of the choral literature during this summer's Festival: the Mozart "Requiem' on Sunday, July 12, the Berlioz "Requiem" on Friday, July 31; and the traditional close of the Berkshire Festival, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The Festival Chorus, of which Hugh Ross is conductor, will be featured in all the works, and soloists for the Mozart "Requiem" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will include Adele Addison, soprano, Florence Kopleff, contralto, Blake Stern, tenor and Donald Gramm, bass. John McCollum will be tenor soloist in the Berlioz "Requiem". Dr. Munch will also present Bach's Cantata No. 50, "Nun ist das Heil", on July 3 and Beethoven's Choral Fantasy on August 7.

Other Festival features include performances of Mozart's Piano Concerto in G major, K. 453 and d'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Air" by the French pianist, Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, and the Concerto for Violin and Obot in C minor by Bach, performed with the Orchestra by Ruth Posselt, violin, and Ralph Gomberg, oboe. Bethany Beardslee, soprano, will be soloist in Bach's Cantata No. 51; "Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen," and the concert of Saturday evening, July 4, will be devoted to performances of Piano Concertos by Bach for one, two, three and four pianos.

The Berkshire Festival dates follow the pattern of previous years with six weekends of concerts on Friday and Saturday evenings at 8:30 and Sunday afternoons at 2::30. The first two weekends of concerts by a small orchestra of Boston Symphony Orchestra members in the Theatre-Concert Hall, under the direction of Charles Munch, are on July 3-4-5 (Bach), and July 10-11-12 (Mozart). Berkshire Pattern Familiar

By MILES KASTENDIECK

NEWS ABOUT Summer music inevitably calls for some mention of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. Aside from being the most famous in the East, it has the aura of the Boston Symphony Orchestra around it. Indeed, the playing of the orchestra must be considered its chief attraction.

Certain of the programs for this Summer follow a familiar pattern. The idea of great composer weekends will be continued. Familiar music will be interspersed with some contemporary works. Numerous soloists will appear, including Rudolf Serkin and Isaac Stern, each of whom will play on three separate occasions.

No Startling Changes

Traditionally, Bach and Mozart are the composers of the first two weekends of July 3 and 10 respectively. Some novelty appears in programming the Bach concertos for 1, 2, 3, and 4 pianos on July 4, and the Mozart Requiem on July 12. Otherwise, the programs have a familiar cast.

The Tchaikowsky weekend of July 17-19 brings only one work of this composer for each concert. This under-emphasis becomes conspicuous with twice as many works of Brahms listed for the weekend of July 24-26.

A curious feature of the Mendelssohn-Schumann weekend is that it will open with the Berlioz Requiem on July 31. Of course the Beethoven weekend of August 7-9 is solid Beethoven, including the Ninth Symphony to close the Festival supposedly as an habitual conclusion.

Under the circumstances it remains obvious that the Berkshire Festival continues to be fundamentally conservative in character. While other festivals, like the Empire State, venture to program new works or neglected ones like Prokofieff's "Alexander Nevsky," the Berkshire Festival sticks close to its Winter repertory. To be sure, the orchestral schedule in Boston with the "Pops" and the Esplanade Concerts may inhibit expansive program-making; nevertheless, the time has come for more daring exploits.

What is surprising this Summer is an apparent dismissal of Handel and Haydn in a year of important anniversaries. Playing some of their music would have kept the conservative pattern yet offered a welcome freshness to the general scheme of presenting great composer weekends.

The chief novelty this season will be a new stage canopy to replace the present shell originally built for the first Berkshire Symphonic Festival 25 years ago. No doubt the orchestra will sound still better, justifying itself all the more.

This area's most famous attraction, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival will open at Tanglewood in Lenox July 1 and close Aug 9.

Only a half mile from the Tanglewood grounds in Lenox, music with a different beat will be on tap from June 28 through Sept. 6 at Music Barn, where Mahalia Jackson, noted gospel singer, will open the season. Piano Recital To End Parker Series

By Alfred W. Burke

LOWELL—One of the outstanding events of the current season is scheduled for tomorrow afternoon at 3 o'clock in the Little theater at Lowell State Teachers college, when Prof. Paul Bregor of the school's department of music presents a piano recital. The concert will be the final program in the 1958-59 Moses Greeley Parker Lecture series.

Aside from his work in the field of teaching, Prof. Bregor has achieved notable success in the field of concert recital. He has been heard throughout the east. He made his debut recital locally two seasons ago. His program for tomorrow lists selections by Beethoven, Bach, Brahms, Chopin and Debussy.

The Broadway musical hit, "Carousel" will be presented by the MENC chapter and the Drama club of LTC in May. The production will be given three nights at the Little theater and is scheduled for May 14-15-16. John A. Coe will direct. Prof. Kalervo Kansanniva is director of scenic execution and lights; Robert Knoop, '59, is musical director and the co-producers are Colleen Moynihan, '59, and Dr. Domenic R. Procopio of the music department faculty at the college.

THERE WILL BE A rather large list of first nighters from Lowell on the occasion of the Metropolitan Opera company's Boston season which will open on Monday evening, April 13 and continue through Sunday afternoon, April 19. On the agenda for first nighters is the now famous American opera, "Vanessa."

The spotlight will be focused on the brilliant young Lowell artist, Rosalind Elias, who achieved almost overnight fame in her first performance in "Vanessa". She will be rejoined by the members who made up the original cast.

The combined talents of Samuel Barber and Gian-Carlo Menotti have given the Met repertoire one of the very few American scores that has survived more than a season. One of the amazing factors concerning this opera is the element of two famous composers combining their talents into an individual work.

However, aside from this the opera offers nothing American in its setting. The opera is set in a "northern country" and is dated in the year 1905. Joining Miss Elias in the cast will be the original members, Steber, Resnik, Gedda, Tozzi, Cehanovsky and Nagay. Ignace Strasfogel will conduct.

RICHARD BURGIN, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra will conduct the concerts on Friday afternoon, March 20 and Saturday evening, March 21. His program will include Beethoven's String Quartet in A minor, Op. 132 (performed by the string orchestra); Stravinsky's Symphony in C and Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".

The same program will be rehearsed at the sixth in the series of open rehearsals on Thursday evening.

Dr. Charles Munch, director of the orchestra, has announced plans for the 1959 Berkshire Festival which will be held at Tanglewood, Lenox, from Wednesday, July 1, and close on Sunday, Aug. 9.

The director will conduct 14 of the 18 Festival concerts and Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's 84-year-old "conductor emeritus" will conduct four concerts, one on each of the last four week-ends.

1959 Berkshire Festival Announced

Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces plans for the Orchestra's 1959 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts. The Festival will open on Wednesday, July 1, and close on Sunday, August 9.

Charles Munch will conduct fourteen of the eighteen Festival concerts and Pierre Monteux, the Orchestra's 84-year-old "conductor emeritus," will conduct four concerts, one on each of the last four weekends.

Rudolf Serkin, pianist, and Isaac Stern, violinist, will each appear at three Festival concerts during the 1959 season. These outstanding artists have made special arrangements to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will perform classics of the concerto literature. Mr. Serkin will be heard in Brahm's Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor, Op. 15, Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto No. 1 in G minor, OP. 25; and two works by Beethoven, the Fantasy for Piano, Chorus and Orchestra, and the Fourth Piano Concerto in G major, Op. 58. Isaac Stern will be soloist in the Violin Concertos of Tchaikovsky, Brahms, and Mendelssohn.

The concerts of the first two weeks of the Festival, in the Theatre-Concert Hall by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be devoted to music of Bach (July 3-4-5) and Mozart (July 10-11-12), and will be conducted by Charles Munch. Berkshire Festival to Open July 1

The 1959 Berkshire Festival, under the aegis of Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., Wednesday, July 1, and close Sunday, Aug. 9. Munch is scheduled to lead 14 of the 18 orchestral concerts while Pierre Monteux, the Boston Orchestra's conductor emeritus, will conduct four events, one on each of the last four week-ends.

Six of the programs will feature the so-called classics of the Concerto literature with Rudolf Serkin, pianist, as soloist at three concerts and Isaac Stern, violinist, for the remaining three. Serkin will play the Brahms Concerto No. 1 in D Minor, Op. 15; Mendelsshon's Piano Concerto No. 1 in G Minor, Op. 25, and two compositions by Beethoven: the Fantasy for Piano, Chorus and Orchestra, and the Fourth Piano Concerto in G Major, Op. 58.

Stern will perform the Violin Concertos of Tchaikovsky, Brahms and Mendelssohn.

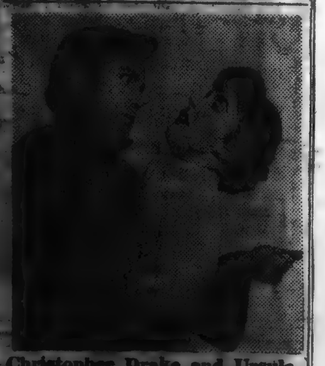
Bach Set for First Week-end

Each Wednesday program during the six weeks will be a chamber music concert. The first series of orchestral concerts, beginning Friday night, July 3, will be devoted to the music of Bach; the second week-end, beginning July 10, to Mozart.

The final four week-ends are to follow a plan of previous years, combining the compositions of great composers of past eras with contemporary music. Tchaikovsky is the man selected for distinction July 17, 18, 19; Brahms for the week-end beginning July 24.

Contemporary Composers

Composers of the Romantic period, including Berlioz, Mendelssohn and Schumann, are slated for the week-end of July 31, while Beethoven will be highlighted Aug. 7, 8 and 9.



Christopher Drake and Ursula Stevens are brother and sister in "'Tis Pity She's a Whore," which now claims to be the second longest-running Elizabethan play in local history.

Among the contemporary composers whose works will be performed are Bohuslav Martinu, Lukas Foss, Walter Piston and Aaron Copland, with Messrs Copland and Foss leading their own compositions.

Munch will present three celebrated selections from the choral literature during the festival: the Mozart "Requiem," Sunday, July 12; the Berlioz "Requiem," Friday, July 31, and the traditional close of the six weeks' series, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Sunday afternoon, Aug. 9.

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Festival Seekers Have Pick of Events All Over the North American Map

By ROSS PARMENTER

THE listing above gives a good idea of the quantity of music that will be available to North Americans this summer. The list is substantially larger than in previous years, but this is in part because a number of local festivals are bidding for wider attention. Festival-givers have come to realize that the automobile has enormously increased the mobility of the summer vacationer and that, if their musical wares are made known nationally, people from the East can be lured West, Westerners can be lured East and travelers passing East and West and North and South can be captured for musical stop-overs.

Actually, there are not many festivals that are totally new this summer, and those that are new are all of relatively modest dimensions, like the concerts at Glen Cove, L. I., and New Canaan, Conn. Perhaps the largest of the new festivals is the folk festival that has been instituted to follow the annual jazz festival at Newport, R. I. And it is interesting that the Newport people have decided to take this additional plunge in the folk direction, for evidence of the increasing drawing power of folk music appears in the programs of other festivals, too.

The Operatic Picture

Opera is suffering a blow in that that it will be entirely absent from the Berkshire Festival, but it is believed this lapse will be for one year only. Elsewhere there are signs of operatic vigor. Julius Rudel has been made general director of opera at Chautauqua, N. Y., and he is including Vittorio Giannini's "The Taming of the Shrew" and Carlisle Floyd's "Wuthering Heights" in the repertory. Mr. Floyd's "Susannah" will be in the repertory of the "Zoo" opera in Cincinnati and this company is modernizing its settings, costumes and lighting. Santa Fe Opera will give Marc Blitzstein's "Regina" and Donizetti's "Anne Boleyn" in addition to more standard works. Red Rocks, just outside Denver, will give Puccini's "The Girl of the Golden West." Central City will give "Fledermaus" and Douglas Moore's "The Ballad of Baby Doe." The two big Canadian festivals will compete with Orpheus operas, Stratford giving the comic "Orpheus in the Underworld" of Offenbach, and Vancouver giving the serious "Orpheus and Euridice" of Gluck. And the American Opera Workshop will give twenty American operas in its first season at the National Music Camp in Interlochen, Mich.

Some of the festivals are showing mobility themselves. New Haven's Starlight Festival of chamber music is moving from the Yale Art Gallery to Saybrook College. In Maine, the Berkley Summer Music School is shifting from North Bridgton to Springvale. And there is a major upheaval in the exit from Ellenville of the Empire State Music Festival. Its ultimate home will be Sterling Forest, near Tuxedo, but because its new quarters are not yet ready, this year's concerts will be in Bear Mountain.

The listing is not complete, for some organizations have not yet drawn up their plans, and no doubt there are some festivals we have not heard of. Also events already in progress are not listed. This includes the Boston "Pops" concerts, which began on April 28 and continue until June 27, and the Festival of Contemporary Art, which began in Cleveland on May 6 and which has a single concert left, a program by the Albeneri Trio on Wednesday.

HEMIDEMISEMIQUAVERS: Claudio Arrau, who recently played all thirty-two Beethoven piano sonatas in Berlin and Hamburg, is currently doing the cycle in Zurich and on June 3 he starts it in London. . . . On July 5 the Orquesta Sinfonica de la Universidad in Mexico City will give the world première of Symphony No. 1 by Ruth Schontal, American composer. . . . Paul Rosenthal, 16-year-old violinist from Madison, Conn., won the $2,000 first prize in the National Symphony's fourth annual Merriweather Post contest.

REPRISE

Kurt Saffir conducted Handel's "Ezio" with "freshness and musicality" and the six young talented singers of the Actor's Opera production made one appreciate the opera. . . . The Dessoff Choirs' performance of Handel's "Israel in Egypt," dramatically led by Paul Boepple, was "an almost perfect oratorio performance." . . . Marvin David Levy contributed some sympathetic new songs to the final "Music in Our Time" program. . . . The compositions by Erich Itor Kahn performed at a memorial concert for him had "craft and polish." . . . Recitalists who made favorable impressions included Varoujian Kodjian, violinist; Carol Eshak, pianist; Milly Suster and Elizabeth Benson Guy, sopranos, and Imre Vasady, bass-baritone.

TRANSFORMATION IN THE BERKSHIRES

By JAMES DURWOOD

PITTSFIELD, Mass.—Bostonians once dismissed Berkshire County as the bucolic Siberia of the Symphony Orchestra during the cultural doldrums of the summer. But automobiles and the Massachusetts Turnpike have changed all that. This summer, with the Turnpike two years old, vacationists from the eastern half of the Commonwealth are discovering what New Yorkers and other hinterland dwellers have long known—that the Berkshires are the crossroads of New England.

Traffic moving eastward to visit the Revolutionary War shrines in and around Boston, or down from Canada on the way to New York, or from New York and other southern points northward, passes, in the Berkshires, through some of the most arresting scenery and gracious towns to be found outside of the feudal south in the plantation era of the last century.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a major part of the cultural life that blossoms each season in this area. But the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute, the Jacobs Pillow Dance Festival and the Great Barrington Horse Show draw visitors from all over the Northeast.

Nor are all the area's tourist attractions esoteric ones. There are ninety woodland lakes and ponds in the hilly countryside. The fisherman has his choice of 274 trout streams. If he thinks his luck has turned for the worst he may visit the southern Berkshire town of Sheffield, where there is a trout farm. There, he may rent a rod and be sure that hundreds of hungry fish await his cast.

Family Camping

For all of the family, more than 80,000 acres of state forest provide camping, swimming and boating. And, for the golfer, the many courses are set in scenic valleys or on rolling hills, so that if his score begins to soar, he can always stop and look at the surroundings and realize that putts are not everything.

Even rainy days are no real problem in this region. Here in Pittsfield is an excellent art and natural history museum. The town also shelters the Berkshire Athenaeum, which has a Herman Melville Memorial Room housing a collection of the works, personal effects and pictures of the author. It was at Pittsfield that Melville wrote his epic novel, "Moby Dick," in 1850.

Crane & Co., in near-by Dalton, has a museum that traces the history of paper-making in America. The company for years has manufactured all of the paper used in printing United States currency.

Mission House in Stockbridge is furnished with priceless antiques all dating back to 1740 and earlier. The house was built in 1739 by the Rev. John Sergeant, the first missionary to the Stockbridge Indians, when this was frontier territory.

The studio of the great American sculptor Daniel Chester French is of special interest to tourists visiting the town of Glendale. Displays include a model of the seated Abraham Lincoln, which Mr. French made for the Lincoln Memorial in Washington, D. C.

The Clark Institute is the newest addition to the area's cultural facilities. It opened at Williamstown in 1953 and already is one of the best known museums of its kind. The paintings so far include thirty-three Renoirs and donations are still being unwrapped.

William R. Tague

PASTORAL—Late afternoon on Laurel Lake near Lee.

Maj. Gen. Henry Knox and his troops had a rough trip through the Berkshires in the winter of 1775-76 when they hauled the cannon from the British fort at Ticonderoga to the support of American troops in Boston. State Route 23 covers part of this trail in the southern Berkshires.

Field of Azaleas

What the Berkshires were, what they are now and what they will be for years to come was demonstrated in 1934 when Civilian Conservation Corps workers discovered a huge field of azaleas near Berry Pond in the Berkshires. They had been planted shortly after the American Revolution. Then for more than 150 years, they had grown untouched, and presumably unseen, less than ten miles from the heart of Pittsfield.

For more than a century, this has been a hideaway for those who wanted to escape from the noisy cities. Mark Twain, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Sinclair Lewis and Melville were among writers of the past who came here. In more recent years, Norman Rockwell, the artist, foresook Vermont for Stockbridge, and James Gould Cozzens, the novelist, came here from New Jersey.

Many of the famous summer homes of millionaires who could afford to live here before paid vacations were a reality have been turned over for the use of schools or religious groups. But some remain retreats for writers and other seeking solitude for a time.

The Massachusetts Turnpike and the projected Federal highway from the Canadian border down to New York will, of course, open up the region to more tourists. But there still will be room for the self-appointed hermits.

For many years, the Mohawk Trail, between here and Greenfield, has been a thoroughfare reminiscent for motorists of the days when radiators boiled over on hills that are easily handled by modern cars. Yet, just a few miles north of the Trail is the town of Rowe, Mass., where the first New England nuclear energy plant is being constructed.

Although night life in the city manner is practically unknown here—where in many towns the traffic lights do no more than blink orange after 11 P. M.—two summer theatres, at Williamstown and Stockbridge, add to the attractions after dark.

The Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony opens July 1 at Tanglewood in the town of Lenox. For those with an ear for a different beat, the Music Barn, only half a mile away, opens June 28, with Mahalia Jackson, the Gospel singer, as the guest artist.

Shawn's Jacobs Pillow Dance Festival at Becket will open its twenty-seventh season on June 30. The Ballet Rambert of London will make its United States debut there July 14, with the first of twenty-four performances.

Six Circle Tours

For those of a restless nature there are six circle tours available in the county, starting from this city. The Berkshire Hills Conference office, at 50 South Street, will furnish detailed information.

For those not driving, the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad and Northeast Airlines offices can furnish summer schedule information, either here in Pittsfield or in New York City. The Conference office also offers information on hotels, motels and tourist homes. Tourists should plan on spending upward of $16 a day for meals and lodging.

Azaleas In Bloom

Myriads of azaleas should be in full bloom within two weeks in the Pittsfield (Mass.) State Forest, fashioning one of nature's prettiest pictures.

The blossoms should be ready to startle and please the eye in time for the beginning of the annual Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., which gets under way on July 1.

Can't Leave Office Worries Behind You?

For those office die-hards who just can't leave their work and worries behind, Trailways Bus System is offering an innovation in coach travel.

Henceforth, the fleet of 85 modern air-conditioned buses which service such spots as Boston, Mass., Norfolk, Va., and Raleigh, N.C., will offer the customary taped music, free pillows and magazines but they will also offer a hook-up whereby passengers can dictate directly into a recording machine for transcription at the end of the run.

New Jet Terminal For Eastern Airlines

Eastern Airlines' new jet-age terminal at Idlewild Airport will open for business Aug. 1 according to announcement by Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker, Eastern's board chairman.

The new terminal will accomodate 24 jet planes. It has four acres of floor space, including a lobby of close to 30,000 square feet.

The airlines company states the new lobby is actually larger than Gran Central Station's passenger concourse. It would have to be in order to handle the estimated 6 million passengers who will use it in the course of the next year.

Antique Autos In Annual Run

More than 150 antique (but still running) automobiles will participate June 20 and 21 at the annual "shore run" of the Antique Automobile Assn. of America in Ocean City, N.J.

The Saturday afternoon festivities will include a "mammoth boardwalk parade" and the old-time cars wil be on public display the next day.

THE FESTIVALS...

Our mail was festival-laden recently. All of which indicates a summer cornucopia of good things for residents and visitors alike. And since summertime is proverbial festive-time we would be a churl not to take due notice of these happenings and post them for your attention.

The four we speak of in this corner are as follows: "THE RUSSIAN FESTIVAL at Madison Square Garden, with performances from July 7th to 18th; THE EMPIRE STATE MUSIC FESTIVAL from July 10th through August 1st; The NEW YORK CITY HUDSON CELEBRATION with performances in Central Park opening July 15th; and the well established BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL in Tanglewood that opens July 1st and closes August [illegible].

Details of the RUSSIAN FESTIVAL include a full program of Music and Dance that will occur concurrently with the Soviet Exposition in New York. (At the end of July an American Exposition and theatrical program settles down in Moscow as an exchange unit but the trip-cost may exceed your commuter's budget). Impresario SOL HUROK, an old hand at these things, is presenting the show which will include Bolshoi soloists, folk dance groups, native instrumentalists, as well as Russian soloists and dancers from the Leningrad Ballet. There will be two programs for variety's sake and numerous contingents from separate Soviets will participate.

The EMPIRE STATE FESTIVAL will highlight symphony concerts and operatic production, all under the general direction of Frank Forest. The Anthony Wayne Recreation Area in Bear Mountain will serve as this year's temporary site. The sponsors are the Sterling Forest Research and Scientific Center and the Palisades Park Commission.

The HUDSON CELEBRATION takes over the Wollman Skating rink to transform it into an open-air Globe-style theatre in Central Park. There will be seats for 2,500 and a full program of afternoon and evening ballets, musical comedies, operas and social events will be produced.

The BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL is the old and reputable summer music holiday. CHARLES MUNCH remains as Music Director and there'll be a full roster of name soloists including RUDOLF SERKIN, ISAAC STERN, NICOLE HENRIOT-SCHWEITZER (a young French pianist) and numerous other talented single and ensemble virtuosi. PIERRE MONTEUX conducts four of the concerts.

The muses are being wooed, and how!

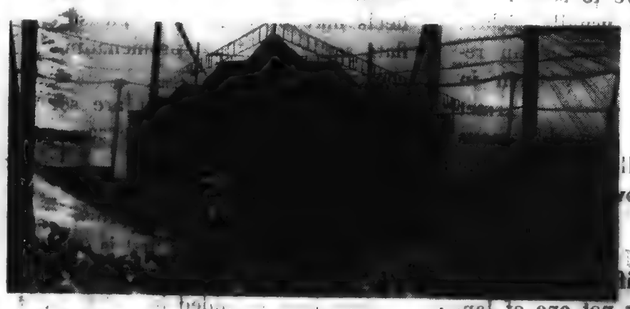
The bright lights of New York City.

FESTIVALS, U.S.A.



A concert at Aspen.

The home of the Santa Fe Opera.

COMES SUMMER, and across the United States many a town and city starts celebrating. It's Festival time—and that means waving flags, billowing tents, beautiful music, impassioned drama, gay crowds gathering for excitement and fun.

If you are planning to "go somewhere" on your vacation and haven't quite decided on the "where," why not consider a Festival town? You'll have all the regular features, plus the extra-added attractions that the special season offers. It adds up to a mighty potent package.

If you wish just a sampling of the many festivals throughout the country, your local travel agent or the chamber of commerce in the various cities and states can supply you with any additional information you'll need.

New York . . . the biggest city puts on its prettiest and brightest face as it proudly proclaims "New York is a Summer Festival." Flags and flowers appear on all the avenues, landmarks are floodlighted . . . Times Square and Broadway give an extra polish to their bright lights. To do any one of a hundred things. Take the two-hour boat trip around Manhattan Island . . . take a five-cent ferry ride to the Statue of Liberty . . . tour the Stock Exchange and the United Nations . . . attend a symphony concert at Lewisohn Stadium, a chamber music concert in Washington Square, a jazz concert at Randall's Island—all outdoors . . . take a parachute jump at Coney Island or a cooling dip at Jones Beach. Take in a gay musical or a gripping drama (and theatre tickets are usually easier to come by in the summer). You can see tennis at Forest Hills, racing at Belmont, the Yankees at the Stadium, the Rockettes at the Music Hall, an outdoor art exhibit in Greenwich Village. You can go Chinese, Hawaiian, French, Spanish, East Indian when you dine. You can dance under the Starlight Roof of the Waldorf or under nature's starlight. And of course there are all the stores . . . a bit of shopping. One thing's certain . . . bored. Two words of advice: make a hotel reservation before you leave home—and once in New York the Visitors Bureau at 90 East 42 St[illegible]

Tanglewood in Lenox, Massachusetts, is synonymous with music—for six weeks it serves as the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The setting—a magnificent estate high in the Berkshires. During the week there are concerts by small instrumental groups and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. But on weekends the symphony takes over. You can listen to Bach, Beethoven, or Berlioz sitting comfortably in the big Music Shed or with the music outside on the lawns. The atmosphere is relaxed, informal—dinner, picnic style, is often the rule before a concert. For a change in tone try the cool, cool jazz at Music Inn, the dance festival at Jacob's Pillow, the summer theatre. There's swimming and sailing in nearby Pittsfield, golf and riding galore, and always the hills for inspiration. Hotels are not numerous—your best bet is to stay at one of the inns or, more cheaply, at a guest house either in Lenox or in one of the neighboring towns. (You can write to the Chamber of Commerce in Lenox for help with reservations.) One word of warning: If you plan to dine out on Saturday evening before the concert make a reserva- (Continued on page 44)

Santa Fe, New Mexico, joins its voices in song—the operatic kind—during its Summer Festival. Such works as Ariadne Auf Naxos, Die Fledermaus, The Abduction From the Seraglio, Madame Butterfly, and The Barber of Seville—will be given at the outdoor Opera Theatre with world-famous singers and conductors taking part. In addition, [illegible] Stravinsky will conduct his "Oedipus Rex" at the historic Cathedral of St. Francis. But music isn't all you'll find at Santa Fe. It's fascinating, combining [illegible] the charm of ancient Spanish and Indian cultures with the newest trends in Southwest. Festival dates: June 24—August 16.

Oregon is 100 this year and the state is going all out on its birthday celebration. Main feature will be the Centennial Exposition in Portland combining historical displays with glimpses into the future. A frontier village, a [illegible] town, an operating logging camp, the multi-million dollar atomic exhibit displayed at the Brussels World's Fair, [illegible] stage, and musical [illegible] ater spectaculars on the [illegible] garden of tomorrow [illegible] day. In the Realm of Music

Munch to Conduct Bulk Of Tanglewood Concerts

by KENNETH GILL

SUMMER SERIES — Continuing the reporting on summer series, today's edition of "In the Realm of Music" turns to Tanglewood and the Berkshire Festival.

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces plans for the orchestra's 1959 Berkshire Festival at Lenox (Mass.), which opens on Wednesday, July 1, and closes on Sunday, Aug. 9.

Charles Munch

Munch will conduct 14 of the 18 festival concerts, and Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's 84-year-old "conductor emeritus," will conduct four concerts, one on each of the last four weekends.

SERKIN, STERN TO APPEAR—Rudolf Serkin, pianist, and Isaac Stern, violinist, will each appear at three festival concerts during the 1959 season. Serkin will be heard in Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1 in D Minor, Op. 15; Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto No. 1 in G Minor, Op. 25; and two works by Beethoven, the Fantasy for Piano, Chorus and Orchestra, and the Fourth Piano Concerto in G Major, Op. 58. Stern will be soloist in the Violin Concertos of Tschaikowsky, Brahms and Mendelssohn.

The concerts of the first two weeks of the festival, in the Theatre-Concert Hall by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be devoted to music of Bach (July 3, 4, 5) and Mozart (July 10, 11, 12) and will be conducted by Charles Munch. The last four weekends will follow a plan of previous years, featuring the works of the great composers, combined with contemporary works.

The opening weekend will give especial prominence to music by Tschaikowsky (July 17, 18, 19) and the following weeks to Brahms (July 24, 25, 26), composers of the Romantic period, including Berlioz, Mendelssohn and Schumann (July 31, Aug. 1, 2), and Beethoven (Aug. 7, 8, 9). Among the contemporary composers whose works will be performed are Bohuslav Martinu, Lukas Foss, Walter Piston and Aaron Copland. Messrs. Copland and Foss will each conduct their own works.

CHORAL WORKS — Dr. Munch will present three great works of the choral literature during this summer's festival: Mozart's "Requiem" on Sunday, July 12; the Berlioz "Requiem" on Friday, July 31, and the traditional close of the Berkshire Festival, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The Festival Chorus, of which Hugh Ross is conductor, will be featured in all the works, and soloists for the Mozart's "Requiem" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will include Adele Addison, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; Blake Stern, tenor, and Donald Gramm, bass. John McCollum will be tenor soloist in the Berlioz "Requiem." Dr. Munch will also present Bach's Cantata No. 50, "Nun ist das Heil," on July 3 and Beethoven's Choral Fantasy on Aug. 7.

Other festival features include performances of Mozart's Piano Concerto in G Major, K. 453 and d'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Air" by the French pianist, Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer and the Concerto for Violin and Oboe in C Minor by Bach, performed with the orchestra by Ruth Posselt, violin, and Ralph Gomberg, oboe.

Bethany Beardslee, soprano, will be soloist in Bach's Cantata No. 51, "Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen," and the concert of Saturday evening, July 4, will be devoted to performances of piano concertos by Bach for one, two, three and four pianos.

OTHER EVENTS — The Berkshire Festival dates follow the pattern of previous years with six weekends of concerts on Friday and Saturday evenings at 8:30 and Sunday afternoons at 2:30. The first two weekends of concerts by a small orchestra of Boston Symphony members in the Theatre-Concert Hall, under the direction of Charles Munch, are on July 3, 4, 5 (Bach), and July 10, 11, 12 (Mozart).

The two Saturday evening concerts of this series on July 4 and July 11 will be held in the Music Shed to accommodate the larger demand for seats for these performances. The last four weekends by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Shed are July 17, 18, 19 (Tschaikowsky); July 24, 25, 26 (Brahms); July 31, Aug. 1, 2 (composers of the Romantic period); Aug. 7, 8, 9 (Beethoven).

Six chamber music concerts will be given on Wednesday evenings during the festival season in the Theater-Concert Hall. These concerts will be given on July 1, 8, 15, 22, 29 and Aug. 5 and proceeds will benefit the Tanglewood Revolving Scholarship Fund of the Berkshire Music Center.

Summer Medley

WARM WEATHER PROGRAM OF CONCERTS FOR NEW YORKERS INCLUDES OPERA, JAZZ, SYMPHONY, POPS, CHAMBER MUSIC

At precisely 11:50 p.m. Sunday the 21st, Summer will trip blithely officially into our town. And if she [illegible] Euterpe, the Grecian muse of music, more than just slightly, no one is going to be surprised. This summer, more than ever, New York is a music-lover's paradise—the program includes concerts of jazz, symphony, opera, chamber music, musical comedy, to be held [illegible] and downtown [illegible] and in ex-urbia [illegible] enterprising Manhattanite.

Already underway, and a sure sign that summer's [illegible] are the Guggenheim Memorial Concerts, continuing through Aug. 14. On the Mall in Central Park Sundays, Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, and in Brooklyn's Prospect Park Thursdays and Saturdays, the Goldman Band will be abetted this summer by an impressive list of guest conductors: Morton Gould June 27 and 28, Skitch Henderson July 18 and 19, Robert Russell Bennett Aug. 6 and 7, Vincent Lopez July 26 and Pedro Sanjuan July 11 and 12 in a program of Spanish music.

When Minnie Guggenheimer strides purposefully out on the floodlit stage at Lewisohn Stadium this Monday (22nd) to address her annual remarks to the first night audience, she'll undoubtedly be welcomed even more warmly than usual for a time it looked as though the Stadium Concerts would be missing this summer, but Mrs. G. and her spunky spirit triumphed and the customary six-week season continues through Aug. 1. The range is all the way from jazz with Louis Armstrong (July 4) to the Verdi Requiem (July 13) and includes the usual evenings devoted to Viennese music (July 6), Italian opera (July 9 and 25) and Rodgers and Hammerstein (Aug. 1).

New on the scene and a welcome addition is the impressively named N. Y. City's Hudson Celebration Theatre-in-the-Park, just erected at Wollman Memorial in Central Park. Intended as a center for all performing arts, the theatre opens July 15, with Melissa Hayden, Andre Eglevsky and a ballet company appearing for three evenings. Jan Kiepura and Marta Eggerth are featured in an Operetta Night on the 18th, and Jose Iturbi and his sister Amparo present a two-piano concert the 19th. More dates and names will be announced later.

Traffic hazards in the Village's Washington Square Park a thing of the past, this year's chamber music concerts will offer about 1,000 more chair-seats to audiences, Mondays in August at 9 p.m. The 24th will be Mozart opera night.

Opera will find an unusual setting, too, on Central Park's Mall, in three concert-style English versions conducted by Franz Bibo with the City Symphony Orchestra and soloists: "Carmen" on July 11, "Merry Widow" July 18 and "Masked Ball" July 25. Also on the Mall will be the three remaining Naumburg Memorial Concerts, July 4, July 31 and Labor Day, all at 8:30 p.m.

Up in the summery green environs of Carl Schurz Park, at East River and 84th St., free symphony concerts will be held Thursday nights during August at 8:30. Frederique Petrides, one of the very few distaff conductors, appears with an orchestra composed of members of the National Symphony of the Air and N.Y. Philharmonic. Much farther downtown, at the Lower Park Amphitheatre, the Evenings by the River concerts, sponsored by the Lower Side Neighborhoods Association, are [illegible] scheduled for Tuesday nights July 28-Aug. 11. The annual Youth Night [illegible] will be held July 21 and "La Traviata" in concert form concludes the series.

The lovely little community of Stony Brook, Long [illegible] presents its annual Music Festival [illegible] Saturday nights commencing June 27 and including programs devoted to jazz, symphony, Gershwin, opera and Broadway. Almost as varied a lineup is planned for four alternating summer Sundays at 8:30 in Morgan Memorial Park, Glen Cove. The first, with the Long Island Little Orchestra Society, takes place July 12.

Out in New Jersey, Glenwood String Quartet [illegible] its series of Quartets and Quintets Concerts, held at the Grange [illegible] third Sunday of each month through September. And in Fairfield, Conn., on the University campus Evenings [illegible] the Stars Fridays at 8:30 will feature Jose Iturbi July 17, Earth [illegible] and Eleanor Steber Aug. 14. More [illegible] music, this time of the chamber [illegible] may be heard in New Canaan [illegible] Salvermine Guild Chamber Music Concerts alternating Sundays at 8, July 12 to Sept. 27.

Farther afield, but readily accessible to the music-eager New Yorker with a bit of traveling time at his disposal, are the annual festivals at Caramoor and Tanglewood, both having become by this time as much a part of New York's summer music program as the Stadium Concerts. The Festival at Caramoor in Katonah runs on weekends June 20 to July 5, with chamber and baroque music as well as symphonic and choral works. Contralto Elena Nikolaidi appears at the opener and harpsichordist Sylvia Marlowe appears July 5.

At Tanglewood, Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony hold forth July 1 to Aug. 9, with Pierre Monteux guesting, Rudolph Serkin and Isaac Stern among the soloists and Beethoven's choral 9th symphony winding things up.

New York's own Empire State Music Festival, not yet able to move into its permanent home at Sterling Forest, will take over temporary headquarters in the Anthony Wayne Recreation Area in Bear Mt.-Harriman State Park for this year's concerts, July 10 to Aug. 1. Among the highlights: a dramatic concert version of Handel's "Semele" July 31 and the "Oedipus Rex" of Stravinsky conducted by Leopold Stokowski July 25.

Following "Rigoletto," the Beverly Theater will present in-the-round versions of "Lil Abner," "Naughty Marietta," "Wish You Were Here," "Oh Captain," "Bloomer Girl," "Carousel" and "Bells Are Ringing." Except for the opera production, the pattern will be similar at outdoor theaters throughout Massachusetts and elsewhere.

BOSTON (UPI)—Musical events in New England this summer will run the scale from jazz in a formal garden to opera in the round.

Sylvan Setting For Great Music

By CYRUS DURGIN

The cultural center of Massachusetts moves westward from Boston to the Berkshires with the coming of Summer. With the Berkshire Festival and Tanglewood as its focal point, a blend of art and entertainment radiates through this beautiful section of the Commonwealth, with its rolling countryside of wooded hills and fertile valleys.

From the glories of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Munch and guest conductors like Pierre Monteux, the visiting or vacationing public may enjoy the theaters at Williamstown and Stockbridge, Ted Shawn's Dance Festival at Jacobs Pillow, near Lee, and a variety of jazz music at various places in the Berkshire vicinity.

Just as this region is a natural crossroads, so does a huge amount of summertime traffic, commercial and private, flow east and west, north and south, through this part of Massachusetts. Accordingly, it is not at all strange that so much activity for the benefit and pleasure of visitors should be found in the Berkshires.

Yet not so long ago, as those of us who can remember what reckon time, Lenox was a very quiet little town peopled by those who lived there year 'round, and the wealthy whose estates brought an impressive formal beauty to the surroundings.

The coming of the Berkshire Symphonic Festivals began to change all that. From slender and most informal beginnings on the horse track at the Dan Fianna Farm in 1934, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts grew into the impressive plant at Tanglewood, with the Festival concerts attracting thousands of visitors, and the work of the Orchestra's Summer school, the Berkshire Music Center, giving further luster and increasing the scope of musical activity.

Today the Berkshire Festivals, whose concerts are divided between the still unique Music Shed and the smaller Theater-Concert Hall [each with basic design by the late Finnish genius of architecture, Eliel Saarinen], are as famous as any in the world. Their public annually runs into six figures.

Summer Music Festivals In Various Parts of U. S.

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI)—If you like to listen to music enough to devote a summer vacation to it, you can choose among the tamed mountains of Western Massachusetts, the untamed mountains of Colorado, a forest in New York state, and the highly civilized desert of New Mexico.

The Massachusetts mountains are the Berkshires at Lenox, Mass., where the Boston Symphony will open its 17th annual festival July 1 and continue it until Aug. 9.

Music Schools

The Colorado mountains are those around Aspen, where the Aspen Music Festival opens a 10-week season, its 10th, June 24. The New York forest is Sterling Forest, near Tuxedo, where the Empire State Music Festival will hold forth for four weeks beginning July 11. The Sante Fe, New Mexico festival is operatic. It runs for eight weeks beginning June 24.

The Berkshire and Aspen festivals also operate music schools, providing pleasant settings for aspiring musical youth to learn something from professionals taking holidays with pay, if somewhat reduced pay. At the Berkshire, Aaron Copland and Lukas Foss will teach composing to selected students and 23 members of the Boston Symphony will teach orchestral playing to amateur players of assorted instruments.

But the big thing about the Berkshire Festival for the listener will be the 18 concerts of the Boston Symphony, 14 under its director, Charles Munch, and four under Pierre Monteux, Rudolf Serkin will be piano soloist in three of the 18, and Isaac Stern will be violin soloist in three.

Chamber Music

They will be week-end concerts, of course, three each week end, beginning Friday evenings, but there will be six consecutive Wednesday evenings of chamber music, beginning July 1. The first week end will be devoted exclusively to Bach, the second exclusively to Mozart. As the festival progresses, 20th century composers will be interwoven with the old masters.

Bach will be one of the big men as Aspen, sharing that honor with Felix Mendelssohn. Their major works will be performed in a big tent three times a week, but there will be works of such moderns as Darius Milhaud, Charles Jones, Benjamin Britten, Claude Debussy and William Schuman.

Opera at Sante Fe

The Sante Fe Festival will stage six operas — Donizetti's "Anna Bolena," Strauss' "Die Fledermaus," Blitzstein's "Regina," Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio," Puccini's "Madame Butterfly," and Rossini's "The Barber of Seville." All will be sang in English.

The company is made up of 85 singers and players drawn from the Metropolitan Opera, the New York City Center Opera, the NBC Opera Co., and the Chicago Lyric Opera. In addition the company has admitted 16 "apprentice" opera singers, who were selected by auditions. They will understudy the major and minor roles and also sing in the chorus.

New England's Summer Musical Events Listed

Boston (UPI) — Musical events in New England this summer will run the scale from jazz in a formal garden to opera in the round.

The season opened, as usual, with the Pops concerts in Boston and will crescendo in July and August in festivals from the New York state line to the sea.

The 74th Pops season at Symphony Hall began on a gala note, the 30th year with Arthur Fiedler on the podium. The Pops programs, which continue through June 27, feature works which Fiedler has made his trademarks in three decades as a conductor.

Two weeks of free outdoor evening concerts on the Charles River Esplanade span the period from the end of the Pops to the opening of the more formal Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox.

Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux will share baton honors with the 104 - member Boston Symphony Orchestra in the series of weekend concerts which conclude Aug. 9. Featured soloists this year will be pianist Rudolf Serkin and violinist Isaac Stern.

The North Shore Music — Theater in Beverly, Mass. establishes a precedent this year with an in-the-round production of Verdi's "Rigoletto."

With Elaine Malban singing Gilda, the opera will be produced and conducted by Boris Goldovsky, director of the New England Opera Theater, the week of June 15. The audience will be seeing an opera production performed in the round center stage of a tent theater.

Following "Rigoletto," the Beverly Theater will present in-the-round version of "Lil Abner," "Naughty Marietta," "Wish You Were Here," "Oh Captain," "Bloomer Girl," "Carousel" and "Bells Are Ringing." Except for the opera production, the pattern will be similar at outdoor theaters throughout Massachusetts and elsewhere.

Opera Group, Inc., a newly-created group with 8,500 organized supporters, announced productions during late May and early June of Rossini's "The Barber of Seville" and Gay's "The Begger's Opera" at the Boston University Theater.

Newport announced another jazz festival for Rhode Island scheduled for the four-day Fourth of July weekend and this year featuring a jazz ballet. The backers said the popular seminars of jazz held at previous festivals would be scheduled again this year.

Castle Hill, the former Crane estate in Ipswich, Mass., balances its summer concerts with jazz and concert musicians with folk singing and dancing. Performances are held in a magnificent formal garden, weather permitting, on weekends beginning July 3 and continuing through August.

George Shearing and Dave Brubeck will start the 1959 series and be followed by the Pro Musica Antiqua, instrumentalists; pianist Gina Bachauer; Jean Destinee and his Haitian dancers; and folk singer Odetta.

Though final arrangements were incomplete as of May 1, Storyville nightclub proprietor George Wein revealed plans for a jazz dance festival in Boston, probably in August.

Keyboard music fans anticipate annual organ concerts at the city hall in Portland, Maine in July; at Methuen, Mass. Memorial Music Hall in mid-summer and at the John Hays Hammond museum at Gloucester, Mass. in August.

MUSIC

Notes On Berkshire Festival

By HELEN A. F. PENNIMAN

THIS afternoon the well-know French-Canadian tenor Joseph Victor Laderoute, of the Conservatory faculty, and his pupil, Junetta Jones, soprano, will be heard in recital at the Peabody at 4 P.M. The program is being sponsored by the Sigma Gamma Rho Sorority, but is open to the public.

THERE are some admirable Baltimoreans, whose noble brows glow with a musical ardor. Not content with the winter's feast of music, they must fare forth in summer, too, notably to that flow of musical soul, sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and known as the Berkshire Festival.

This is always held at a lovely spot near Lenox, Mass., called Tanglewood, and there you may enjoy every type of music, from full orchestra, under the baton of Charles Munich and guest artists of similar calibre, to chamber music and instrumental soloists. Also vocal soloists and choral music.

And even opera, under the skilled guidance of Boris Goldowsky, who has sponsored not a few premieres at Tanglewood, — though this special feature will be omitted, we now understand, while Mr. Goldowsky takes a summer in Europe, to write a book.

THE FESTIVAL opens on July 1, with a series of 6 chamber music concerts, running till July 5, varied by five concerts by the Berkshire Music School orchestra —also managed by the Orchestra and free to friends— and by some 18 programs by the famous orchestra itself. These start on July 3, running almost daily till August 9, and for these Mr. Munch has invited his countryman and colleague, Pierre Monteux, to share the conductor's duties.

The soloists will include Rudolf Serkin, the pianist so well known to us hereabouts, the violinist Isaac Stern, as well as Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, piano; John McCollum, tenor; Ruth Posselt, violin; Ralph Gombers, oboe; Adele Addison, soprano; Florence Kopleff, alto; Blake Stern, tenor; Donald Gramm, bass. Hugh Ross will again lead the Festival Chorus.

ALL OF THESE events may be subscribed to in series, or singly. The school was founded by the late Serge Koussevitsky, as a centre where young musicians could add to their experience under the guidance of eminent artists.

William Kroll coaches in chamber music, and Aaron Copland heads the composition faculty.

Nation's Music Draws Tourists

By GEORGE GREIFF

America's tourists, who once sought quietude and the gentle songs of birds, are now more likely to flock to vacation spots that ring with the louder sounds of man-made song.

They are crowding—for instance—into music festivals, a billion-dollar enterprise the world over, and one which draws millions of listeners to scores of tourist centers.

In our own hemisphere these are perhaps the best known summer festivals:

Abingdon, Va.: Virginia Highlands Festival, Aug. 1-15, features concerts by the Highlands Chamber Orchestra and an opera workshop conducted by Ludwik Sikorski.

Anchorage, Alaska: Combined festival and summer school, June 15-25, features Robert Shaw as conductor of the Anchorage Symphony Orchestra and Community Chorus.

Aspen, Colo.: Festival-music school, June 24-Aug. 30, directed by Izler Solomon.

Brevard, N.C.: This festival, the closest to Atlanta, is to be held during July and August; exact dates have not been announced. Directed by conductor James C. Pfohl, it is coordinated with the Transylvania music teaching camp.

Chicago: This one-day festival that draws 75,000 persons to Soldier Field each year is scheduled Aug. 22 and will introduce a new Ferde Grofe composition.

Newport, R.I.: Jazz festival, July 2-5.

Ojai, Calif.: Festival stressing modern works, May 22-24, conducted by Robert Craft.

Tanglewood, Mass.: Berkshire Festival, July 1-Aug. 9, will be highlighted by concerts of the Boston Symphony conducted by Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, with pianist Rudolf Serkin and violinist Isaac Stern.

Tuxedo, N.Y.: Empire State Festival opens four-week season July 11 with a concert conducted by Leopold Stokowski.

Vancouver, B.C.: This festival, July 11-Aug. 15, will be directed by Nicholas Goldschmidt and will feature pianist Rudolf Firkusny and soprano Elisabeth Schwarzkopf.

AMERICA'S BIG cities are planning summer musical activity, too. The Cincinnati Summer Opera season will last from June 20 to July 19. Beginning in mid-June, the "pops" season will be in full swing: the Crescent City Concerts at New Orleans, the Philharmonic Symphony in New York City's Lewisohn Stadium, the Chicago Symphony at Ravinia on Chicago's North Shore, the Philadelphia Orchestra in Robin Hood Dell, and the Hollywood Bowl concerts are a few of the best.

It would be impractical to list any but the most famous of the many European festivals. These are:

Athens, Greece: This one, Aug. 1-Sept. 15, features the Greek State Symphony, Israel Philharmonic, Chicago Symphony, conductors Dimitri Mitropoulos, Fritz Reiner and Hans Rosbaud, and pianist Gina Bachauer and soprano Schwarzkopf.

Edinburgh, Scotland: This event, Aug. 23-Sept. 12, stars the Stockholm Royal Opera, Czech Philharmonic, Royal Philharmonic, Scottish National Orchestra, singers Irmgard Seefried and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, cellist Pierre Fournier and violinist Wolfgang Schneiderhan.

Florence, Italy: The May Festival, through July 15, ranges from opera to symphony to jazz, and features artists like soprano Eileen Farrell and violinist Nathan Milstein.

Glyndebourne, England: This, the best of all opera festivals, is scheduled May 28-Aug. 16.

Lucerne: The best of the Swiss festivals, Aug. 19-Sept. 9, includes the London Philharmonic and its choir; conductors Ferenc Fricsay, Ernest Ansermet, Herbert von Karajan, Rafael Kubelik, Otto Klemperer and Sir Thomas Beecham; and soloists like pianists Edwin Fischer and Artur Rubinstein, violinists Yehudi Menuhin and Milstein, and singers Schwarzkopf, Seefried, Fischer-Dieskau and Lisa Della Casa.

Vienna: This may be the most fabulous musical event of them all. To be held May 30-June 21, it will feature six orchestras including Vienna's own Philharmonic and Symphony and the refugee Philharmonia Hungarica, five choirs, 21 conductors including Karl Bohm, von Karajan and composer Paul Hindemith, and 18 famed soloists like violinists Menuhin, Milstein, Schneiderhan and Zino Francescatti and pianists Wilhelm Backhaus, Robert Casadesus and Jorge Demus.

Want Music Festival? There's Wide Choice

NEW YORK—(UPI)—If you like to listen to music enough to devote a summer vacation to it, you can choose among the tamed mountains of western Massachusetts, the untamed mountains of Colorado, a forest in New York State, and the highly civilized desert of New Mexico.

The Massachusetts mountains are the Berkshires at Lenox, Mass., where the Boston Symphony will open its 17th annual festival July 1 and continue it until Aug. 9.

The Colorado mountains are those around Aspen where the Aspen Music Festival opens a 10-week season, its 10th, June 24. The New York forest is Sterling Forest, near Tuxedo, where the Empire State Music Festival will hold forth for four weeks beginning July 11. The Santa Fe Festival is operatic. It runs for eight weeks, beginning June 24.

The Berkshire and Aspen Festivals also operate music schools, providing pleasant settings for aspiring musical youth to learn something from professionals taking busmen's holidays with pay, if somewhat reduced pay. At the Berkshire, Aaron Copland Ukas Foss will teach composing to selected students, and 23 members of the Boston Symphony will teach orchestral playing to amateur players of assorted instruments.

But the big thing about the Berkshire Festival for the listener will be the 18 concerts by the Boston Symphony, 14 under its music director, Charles Munch, and four under Pierre Monteux. Rudolf Serkin will be piano soloist in three of the 18 and Isaac Stern will be violin soloist in three.

They will be weekend concerts, of course, three each weekend, beginning Friday evenings, but there will be six consecutive Wednesday evenings of chamber music, beginning July 1. The first weekend will be devoted exclusively to Bach, the second exclusively to Mozart. As the festival progresses, 20th Century composers will be interwoven with the Old Masters.

Bach will be one of the big men as Aspen, sharing that honor with Felix Mendelssohn. Their major works will be performed in a big tent three times a week, but there will be works of such moderns as Darius Milhaud, Charles Jones, Benjamin Britten, Claude Debussy and William Schuman.

The Santa Fe festival will stage six operas—Donizetti's "Anna Bolena," "Strauss' "Die Fledermaus," Blitzstein's "Regina," Mozart's "The Abduction form the Seraglio," Puccini's "Madame Butterfly" and Rossini's "The Barber of Seville." All will be sung in English.

The company is made up of 85 singers and players drawn from the Metropolitan Opera, the New York City Center Opera, the NBC Opera Company and the Chicago Lyric Opera. In addition, the company has admitted 16 "apprentice" opera singers, who were selected by auditions. They will understudy the major and minor roles and also sing in the chorus.

CODMAN SQUARE GOOD EXAMPLE O

In summertime, librarians seek to encourage reading by means of displays and exhibits emphasizing appropriate seasonal themes or topics of special current interest.

Reading Themes

What a branch library can do in this direction is well illustrated by Codman Square's plans for the summer months. That branch will build adult reader interest around two natural warm-weather themes: music and drama, and sports and travel. June's Boston Arts Festival, July's Esplanade Concerts, and the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood will be the season's highlights for music, while the nearly continuous offerings of summer theater, indoors and on-the-green, will serve as focal points for drama.

Guild Tournaments Attract Scores of Pianists

By Alfred W. Burke

LOWELL—The regional National Piano Guild tournaments which are being conducted locally through next Wednesday at Lowell State Teachers college has attracted students from several communities in the Merrimack Valley.

The event which is under the direction of Miss Eva M. Lequin of this city is listing about 25 pianists each day. Conducting the auditions is the noted pianist and teacher, George Kelver.

Mr. Kelver brings to the auditions a splendid background both in concert and teaching fields. Several years ago he was invited to join the staff of selected judges who travel to different sections of the country for the yearly auditions.

The board of judges, numbering about 200, hear about 53,000 young people who gather at the 650 centers in order to receive expert advice and an analysis of their prospective in the field of concert playing.

Each student must essay the same pattern of routine. This means that the pianist must approach such points as rhythm, accuracy, tone-quality, phrasing and pedaling. These are among the 32 points covered in the auditions.

The auditionee plays from memory and is responsible to present from three to ten numbers, all above the elementary stage. Stress is placed on scales and cadences. The auditions are conducted privately, a factor that enables the young musician to approach his work with ease and confidence.

Success has marked the audition series conducted here in past years. However, from official reports received during the week the current affair has attracted the largest number of students to date as well as many more teachers who are established in the field.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, music director, announces the complete roster of soloists for this summer's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts, which opens July 1 and closes August 7.

INCLUDED IN THE LIST will be the outstanding piano virtuoso, Rudolf Serkin, who will appear on three separate Festival programs as will Isaac Stern, the remarkable American violinist.

Other outstanding artists will include, Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, Lukas Foss, Bernard Zighera and Ralph Berkowitz, pianists; Bethany Beardslee and Adele Addison, sopranos; John McCollum and Blake Stern, tenors; Florence Kopleff, alto; Donald Gramm, bass; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ruth Posselt, violin; Ralph Gomberg, oboe and the Festival Chorus under the baton of Hugh Ross.

Dr. Charles Munch will conduct 14 of the Festival concerts and the beloved "conductor emeritus", Pierre Monteux, will conduct four of the concerts. Arthur Fiedler will return for the concert of August 6 to direct the now famous Tanglewood of Parade program.

Next week's performance of Verdi's "Rigoletto" at the North Shore Music theatre brings another first for Boris Goldovsky. The idea of opera in-the-round could be the start of a new operatic ear on the New England scene. Another first will be marked when Evelyn Mekelatos, contralto, of Groton and formerly of Lowell appears as one of the four top leads in the cast. She will be the first local singer to appear in such a production as this.

Two Massachusetts composers, both graduates of Boston University School of Fine and Applied arts, have won Student Composer awards in the seventh annual contest. Alan D. Kemler of Chestnut Hill and Dr. Michael M. Horvit of Pepperell are among the nine American composers who received a total of $8000 in the contest. Mr. Kemler received $1500 for his composition, Duo Concertante for Flute and Clarinet and Dr. Horvit, $1000 for his Symphony No. 1.

Both composers have been affiliated with the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Dr. Horvit as bass trombonist on 1955, and Mr. Kemler as a member of the composition department in 1948 where his works were performed in the Composers Forum. His first string quartet was presented in 1947 by the Zimbler String quartet.

A Look At the Arts

By E.J.D.

Lily Dumont, the gifted New Bedford pianist who returned last month from her fourth consecutive European concert tour, continues to win critical acclaim for her keyboard artistry.

On May 19, Miss Dumont appeared as soloist with the Corning (N. Y.) Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Theodore Hollenbach. Miss Dumont performed Mozart's "Concerto No. 26 in D. Major" with the orchestra in a program that concluded the Corning group's 1958-59 concert season.

EARL J. DIAS

Bob Lyon, music critic for the Corning Leader, called Miss Dumont, "a pianist who is in love with the music of Mozart." He noted that "she approaches the relaxed style of Mozart in its own spirit. Her affinity for the composer's work was especially evident—as it should be—in the andante movement. To perform the graciously simple, folk-tune like second movement of a Mozart concerto as it should be performed requires art of a high order. Miss Dumont's tone, phrasing, and rhythms meet this requirement."

Mr. Lyon also praised Miss Dumont's legato style in the rondo third movement. Her style, he observed, was "full of spontaneity and was never forced. To this listener's ears," he concluded, "Miss Dumont's Mozart sounds much like that of Robert Casedesus. And if there is a more sympathetic interpreter of Mozart than Casedesus, we do not know who it is."

Plenty of Culture Available for Area Residents

Anyone interested in the performing arts should be able to schedule a busy Summer for himself unless oppressive humidity makes him retreat to a comfortable back-yard chair and a tall cool drink.

Those who do not mind driving on a Summer night will have plenty of straw-hat playhouses in which to sample theatrical fare. Within comparatively comfortable driving distance are the numerous straw-hat theaters on the Cape, besides those in Newport and Little Compton, R. I.

More venturesome souls might like to journey to Stratford, Conn., where the American Shakespeare Festival and Academy will be offering a repertory season. And up in Stratford, Ontario, another Shakespeare festival will be offering "Othello" and "As You Like It."

Locally, on July 2 and 3, the Spouters will present three plays from Noel Coward's "Tonight at 8:30" collection at Jose da Costa's Summer home in South Dartmouth.

Jazz enthusiasts will unquestionably flock to Newport in early July for the annual jazz festival which will be followed, on July 11 and 12, by the Newport Folk Festival. This new enterprise will feature such well-known folk singers as Pete Seeger, Odetta, Josh White, the Gateway Singers and Theo Bikel. Folk humorists also will be included on the program.

Those who like their music of more long-hair vintage can drive to Tanglewood in the Berkshires where the Boston Symphony Orchestra's internationally-known festival begins on July 2 and continues through Aug. 10. This season there will be the customary symphonic and chamber music programs, choral concerts, and soloists including pianists Leon Fleisher, Eugene Istomin, Seymour Lipkin, Lukas Foss, and Leonard Pennario; violinists Zino Francescatti, Berl Senofsky, Ruth Posselt; violinist Joseph de Pasquale, and vocalists Margaret Harshaw, Hilde Gueden, and Donald Gramm. Composers to be featured this season are Bach, Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner.

In other words, area residents can find plenty to do this Summer besides acquiring a tan and following the up-and-down fortunes of the Red Sox and Ted Williams.

A Look at Broadway — Past and Present

Variety has just published its annual analysis of the Broadway season. According to the famous trade paper's box score, the 1958-59 season (which officially ended on Memorial Day) saw 38 new plays, 12 new musicals, and seven revivals for a total of 57 productions, one more than in the 1957-58 season.

Of these 57 presentations, Variety rates 13 of them as hits. To qualify for this category, a production must have actually recovered its investment. The 13 are "Flower Drum Song," "J.B.," "La Plume de Ma Tante," "Majority of One," "Marriage-Go-Round," "Once More With Feeling," "Party" with Betty Comden and Adolph Green, "Raisin in the Sun," "Shakespeare's Ages of Man" (John Gielgud's solo outing), "Sweet Bird of Youth," "Tall Story," "Touch of the Poet" and "World of Suzie Wong."

There are likewise six productions whose status is not yet determined but which seem likely, if their runs continue, to enter the hit category. These are "Destry Rides Again," "The Gazebo," "Gypsy," "Make a Million," "Rashomon" and "Redhead."

Thirty-one of the season's productions were failures, one of the most expensive being the musical, "Juno," which starred Shirley Booth and Melvyn Douglas.

Variety's annual tabulations also demonstrate conclusively the devastating effect on the Broadway theater of the coming of talking movies in the '30s and the TV bonanza of the '40s and '50s. For example, the busiest Broadway season of all time occurred in 1927-28 when 264 productions were on display. Naturally, costs were much less in those halcyon days. In 1927-28, there were 183 new plays, 53 new musicals, and 28 revivals. The season of 1931-32 was the last period in which more than 200 productions hit Broadway.

And 1937-38 was the last season to witness more than 100 productions—111, to be exact. Since then, mounting costs and competition from other media have caused a steady decline in the number of Broadway presentations. Since 1950, for example, the largest number of productions has been 81 (1950-51) and the smallest number 54 (1952-53). During the last five years, the number has remained fairly constant, ranging between 56 and 63.

Judging from present conditions in the current Broadway theater world, it is unlikely that we shall ever see the tremendous theater activity of the late '20s and early '30s. Inflation has caught up with all of us.

HERE AND THERE—The New York Philharmonic will perform on Aug. 16 at the Salzburg Festival . . . Duo-pianists Luboschutz and Nemenoff, who appeared here this season, are concertizing in Greece . . . "The Jazz Word," an anthology of writings about jazz, will be published by Ballantine Books in the Fall . . . Louis Prima and Keely Smith have signed a long-term contract with Dot Records . . . ABC-TV is dropping You Asked for It.

Sales of pistols and revolvers have risen 10 percent this year. Could it be the influence of TV's horse operas and cops-and-crooks extravaganza? . . . Garson Kanin's new novel, "Blow Up a Storm," will be made into a film starring Frank Sinatra as a jazzman . . . A Walt Disney unit is in Scotland filming backgrounds for "Kidnapped" . . . Lev Oborin, one of Russia's leading concert pianists, will make his North American debut this Summer at the Stratford, Ont., Shakespeare Festival.

Gloria Lane, American mezzo-soprano, has scored a hit in "Carmen" at La Scala, Milan . . . Debbie Reynolds and Glenn Ford will co-star in M-G-M's film version of the Broadway murder tale, "The Gazebo" . . . M-G-M's "Ask Any Girl" has been selected as the official American entry at the Berlin Film Festival.

You Can Put a Lilt Into Your Vacation

NEW YORK — (UPI) — If you like to listen to music enough to devote a summer vacation to it, you can choose among the tamed mountains of western Massachusetts, the untamed mountains of Colorado, and the desert of New Mexico.

The Massachusetts mountains are the Berkshires at Lenox, Mass., where the Boston symphony will open its 17th annual festival July 1 and continue it until Aug. 9.

THE COLORADO mountains are those around Aspen where the Aspen Music festival opens a 10-week season, its 10th, June 24.

The New York forest is Sterling forest, near Tuxedo, where the Empire State Music festival will hold forth for four weeks beginning July 11.

The Santa Fe, N. M., festival is operatic. It runs for eight weeks beginning June 24.

The Berkshire and Aspen festivals also operate music schools, providing pleasant settings for aspiring musical youth to learn something from professionals taking busmen's holidays with pay, if somewhat reduced pay.

At the Berkshire, Aaron Copland and Ukas Foss will teach composing to selected students and 23 members of the Boston symphony will teach orchestral playing to amateur players of assorted instruments.

But the thing about the Berkshire festival for the listener will be the 18 concerts of the Boston symphony, 14 under its music director, Charles Munch, and four under Pierre Monteux. Rudolf Serkin will be piano soloist in three of the 18 and Isaac Stern will be violin soloist in three.

THEY WILL BE week-end concerts, of course, three each week-end, beginning Friday evenings, but there will be six consecutive Wednesday evenings of chamber music, beginning July 1.

The first week-end will be devoted exclusively to Bach, the second exclusively to Mozart. As the festival progresses, 20th century composers will be interwoven with the old masters.

Bach will be one of the big men at Aspen, sharing that honor with Felix Mendelssohn. Their major works will be performed in a big tent three times a week, but there will be works of such moderns as Darius Milhaud, Charles Jones, Benjamin Britten, Claude Debussy and William Schuman.

THE SANTE FE festival will stage six operas — Donizetti's "Anna Bolena," Strauss' "Die Fledermaus," Blitzstein's "Regina," Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio," Puccini's "Madama Butterfly," and Rossini's "The Barber of Seville." All will be sung in English.

Billerica Women in Concert Tomorrow

By Alfred W. Burke

LOWELL — The fifth annual concert by the Center Singers will be presented tomorrow evening at the Dale Parish house, Billerica, at 8 o'clock. The group was originally the Women's Chorus of the First Congregational church.

During the past two seasons, the chorus has grown in membership. Concerts have been given at the Masonic home in Charlton, and recently, at the dedication of the newly built Vining school. A program of sacred and secular music has been planned for tomorrow's concert.

Miss Eva M. Lequin, audition program chairman, has announced that this year's National Piano Guild tournament series for this district will be held in the Little Theater at Lowell State Teachers college from June 10 to the 17th.

This will mark the third annual series in Lowell. During the past two years the auditions have brought to light several promising young pianists. The enrollment to date exceeds previous figures.

The judge for Lowell will be George Kelver, noted pianistand Guild judge. Mr. Kelver will be in complete charge of the auditions and during his stay will hear 160 aspiring young artists.

Miss Evelyn Mekelatos, mezzo-contralto, of Groton, and formerly of this city, will join Elaine Malbin, Ronald Holgate and James Berg as leading singers in the North Shore Music theater production of Verdi's "Rigoletto."

This event, scheduled for the week of June 15, and under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, will establish a new era for opera in New England. For the first time, summer opera fans will enjoy opera whose setting is in-the-round.

THE PRODUCTION will offer to listeners a fine cast of operatically-experienced artists. Each singer has enjoyed a successful season and in the case of Miss Malbin, especially so in TV. Both Mr. Holgate and Mr. Berg are top vocalists and promise to carry their careers far into the operatic and concert fields. Miss Mekelatos recently scored a tremendous success in Bizet's "Carmen" with the Boston-New England company in which she essayed the title role.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Charles Munch, music director, announces the complete roster of soloists for this summer's Berkshire festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, which opens July 1 and closes Aug. 7.

The outstanding piano virtuoso, Rudolph Serkin, will appear on three separate festival programs as will Isaac Stern, the American violinist. Mr. Serkin will be heard in Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 (July 26); Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto No. 1 and Schumann's Concert Piece, Opus 92 (Aug. 1); and Beethoven's Choral Fantasy with Piano and Piano Concerto No. 4 (Aug. 7).

Mr. Stern will be soloist in the violin concertos of Tchaikovsky (July 18), Brahms (July 24), and Mendelssohn (Aug. 2).

Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, the young French pianist, will be soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in G Major, K. 453 on July 10 and will appear again on Sunday afternoon, July 19 in D'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVALS

Tanglewood, Music Barn And Jacob's Pillow Dance

PITTSFIELD, Mass.—The azalea fields at Pittsfield State Forest, one of New England's most colorful displays, are nearing their peak and will provide a brilliant show in the Berkshire Hills for the next couple of weeks.

The azalea fields, largest of their kind in New England, are located just eight miles from the center of Pittsfield in the heart of the Berkshires. They may be reached over a hard-surfaced road which for three miles follows the brink of heavily forested Lulu Cascade.

The pink flowering trees cover 100 acres of land surrounding Berry Pond atop a 2000-foot peak.

The Berkshires' most famous cultural attraction, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival, will open at Tanglewood in Lenox July 1 and close Aug. 9. Dr. Charles Munch, director, will conduct 14 of the 18 festival concerts. Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's conductor emeritus, will direct one concert on each of the last four week-ends of the season.

If you like your music with a more modern beat, you will appreciate the menu at Music Barn, only a half-mile from the Tanglewood grounds in Lenox. Louis Armstrong and his group will open the fifth season of the Berkshire Music Barn the evening of June 28, a Sunday. Music Barn offers a schedule of jazz and folk music concerts through Sept. 6.

Ted Shawn's Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival will open its 27th season June 30 and will run through Aug. 29. The opening Pillow program — June 30-Aug. 4—will include Pearl Lang and Dance Company in "Falls the Shadow," Ruth St. Denis in her newest work, "The Blue Madonna of St. Marks," and Alvin Allen & Co. in "Blues" and "Latin American Sketches."

In the southern Berkshire town of Stockbridge, the Berkshire Playhouse will open a 10-week season July 6 with "Time Remembered," and the Williamstown Theater in the college town of the same name will raise the curtain for an eight-week season July 3, opening with "Auntie Mame."

Another Berkshire Hills favorite, the July Fourth Firemen's Muster in Pittsfield, will open a five-day program June 30. The muster closes July 4 with a gigantic parade, followed by competitions between volunteer fire companies in ladder and hose cart races and band and drum corps drills.

More detailed information on what to see and do in the Berkshires may be secured by writing the Berkshire Hills Conference, 50 South St., Pittsfield. Circle tour folders outlining suggested automobile tours of Berkshire County, with map, also may be secured on request.

Taking a Trip?

Berkshire Visit Is Rewarding

By FRANCIS CHURCH
Staff Reporter

Know someone who hates classical music? Want him to like it?

If so, take him to Tanglewood (Yankee-version) near Lenox in the Berkshire Hills of western Massachusetts.

That's where the Boston Symphony Orchestra maintains its summer music school (with students from throughout the world—including this year Miss Geraldine McIlroy of Winston-Salem) and performs Friday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons during the weekends from July 2-Aug. 9.

If after a weekend with the Boston Symphony, the classical musical hater still hates classical music, one can still be a good host. Each Sunday evening during the summer there are jazz concerts at the Jazz Barn, a stone's throw from the Berkshire Music Center.

For those who LIKE classical music, there are concerts practically each night at the music center. Student groups perform on Tuesdays and Thursdays; there is chamber music by leading groups on Wednesdays. During the day, there are symposiums on contemporary music, often led by the composers themselves.

Other Attractions

Besides music, the Berkshire Hills are full of summer "stock" theaters . . . there is an art museum at Williamstown, seat of Williams College . . . and there are sports car races at Lime Rock, Conn.

What makes Tanglewood so appealing even to the musically uninitiated? The location.

When you go, drive to the music center in order to arrive 15 minutes before concert time. Stand on the green lawns and watch the sun set behind the Berkshires, leaving the sky tinted pink . . . the mountains, valley and lake in Stockbridge Bowl a deep blue.

Then step into the music shed (it seats 6,000, opens on the sides to reveal towering white pines and elms). Hear the first chords of the 110-piece Boston Symphony, always the greatest thrill of a Tanglewood vacation.

At intermission, glance onto the rolling lawns of Tanglewood, now covered with 3,000 people . . . some in Bermuda shorts and sports shirts, others with cribs containing small fry (who somehow always seem to remain quiet throughout the concerts).

After it's all over, head from car-crowded parking lots into traffic-filled highways . . . all folks who have chosen music instead of the so-called popular diversions for a summer evening's entertainment.

15 Hours Away

Superhighways have brought the Berkshire Festival "close" to Winston - Salem and Northwest North Carolina. It is now 15 hours driving time away.

By lingering longer on the way, the tourist can enjoy such spots as Virginia's Natural Bridge, Shenandoah Valley and caverns. . . . Washington's many attractions . . . New Jersey's palisades . . . New York's West Point . . . and others.

Although the Berkshires are tame compared to North Carolina's Great Smokies and Blue Ridge, one can enjoy drives through the area's neat countryside, the trip to the top of Mount Greylock, Massachusetts' tallest peak, or a walk among the rocks of Monument Mountain between Stockbridge and Great Barrington, Mass.

Accommodations are numerous. Stockbridge is the most pleasant spot for lodgings and only a few miles from Tanglewood. Other nearby towns with numerous hotels and motels are Lenox, Great Barrington and Pittsfield.

How to get there:

The quickest route is via U. S. 158 to Reidsville, U. S. 29 to Danville, Va., U. S. 58 to South Hill, Va., U. S. 1 to Petersburg, Va., Richmond-Petersburg Turnpike to U. S. 1 on the other side of Richmond, U. S. and Shirley Freeway to Washington, Washington-Baltimore Parkway to Baltimore Tunnel (the tunnel takes you UNDER Baltimore) U.S. 40 to Delaware Bridge, New Jersey Turnpike to Garden State Parkway, Garden State Parkway to New York Thruway, New York Thruway to Berkshire spur, Berkshire spur to Massachusetts Turnpike which has exits in the Lenox-Stockbridge area.

Tolls are charged on the Richmond - Fredricksburg Turnpike, Baltimore Tunnel, Delaware Bridge, New Jersey Turnpike, Garden State Parkway, New York Thruway and Massachusetts Turnpike. The price tag is computed on a mileage basis.

38th Opera Season To Open At Cincinnati Zoo Saturday

Expanded festivals in various sections of the country are slated for the vacation season.

WITH THE PEAK of the summer vacation period just around the corner, music festicals the country over are completing preparations for the 1959 season.

The American tourist, with a little advance planning, can have music wherever he goes.

The Cincinnati Summer Opera Association is going all out this year to make its 38th season at the Zoo Pavilion a success. The battered backdrops and crumpled hangings of former years have all been scrapped in an effort to bring its productions up to date.

Work on Details

Wolfgang Roth, internationally known stage designer, and Dino Yannopoulos, stage director of the Metropolitan, have been in Cincinnati the past several weeks to personally supervise the endless details involved in preparing for the coming season. New sets, new lighting,

The season opens next Saturday with "Aida," starring Mary Curtis-Verna, Piero Miranda-Ferraro, Constantine Ego and Nell Rankin. The following night's opera is "Tosca," and the season extends through July 18. Complete details and tickets are available from the Summer Opera Ticket Office, Fifth and Vine Streets, Cincinnati, Ohio. Mail orders, claims the management, will be given special attention. At Berkshire

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood promises another fine season, with Rudolf Serkin and Isaac Stern heading the list of soloists. The Boston Symphony will be conducted by its regular, Charles Munch, and Pierre Monteux will step in for four concerts. Outstanding event of the festival is apt to be Munch's performance of the rarely scheduled Berlioz Requiem. Request brochure and details from Berkshire Festival at Lenox, Mass. The festival runs from July 1 through August 9.

Chicago's Ravinia Festival opens on June 30 with a concert conducted by Pierre Monteux. Ravinia's 24th season runs through August 15, with symphony concerts at 8:30 p. m. every Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday. Chamber music, ballad and jazz programs will be interspersed throughout the six weeks of symphony programs.

Ballet To Take Over

During Ravinia's final week (August 10-15), the New York City Ballet will take over with a company including Diana Adams, Melissa Hayden, Allegra Kent, Jacques d'Amboise, and other star members of its company. Included in the repertory will be Symphony in C, "Western Symphony," "Stars and Stripes," "The Seven Deadly Sins," "Interplay," "The Cage" and others.

Going West? The Aspen Music Festival has grown until it is the longest in the country. According to first-hand observers, it is also one of the most distinguished. Music of Bach and Mendelssohn will be featured this season, but many other composers are represented on the programs.

The season opens June 24 and runs through August 30. Concerts are given each week on Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday, and all programs begin at 4 p.m.

Nell Rankin will sing the role of Amneris in the opening of "Aida" at Cincinnati Zoo on Saturday.

Festivals Serve Up Culture

Summer festival time is here again and the celebrated centers of vacation culture have again prepared musical menus which will tempt Clevelanders to hit the festival trail.

Attractions within fairly convenient driving distance of Cleveland are:

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL: New England's annual contribution at Lenox, Mass., again offers Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux conducting the Boston Symphony. The Tanglewood season runs from July 1 to Aug. 9, and has as its best feature this year the Berlioz "Requiem" with tenor John McCollum as soloist.

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the Beaux Arts Trio of New York and pianist Rudolf Serkin and violinist Issac Stern are other notables. Also listed are pianists Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer and Lukas Foss and violinist Ruth Posselt. 510 miles.

STRATFORD FESTIVAL: The big musical event at the seventh Canadian splurge is the production of Offenbach's comic opera "Orpheus in the Underworld." John McCollum, Martial Singher and Irene Jordan have the leads and Louis Applebaum will conduct. Russian pianist Lev Oborin will make his North American debut.

The Shakespeare drama this year will be "As You Like It" and "Othello." Chamber and folk music, international film offerings, Robert Kemp's "The Heart is Highland" and a new revue also are scheduled between June 29 and Sept. 19. 315 miles.

RAVINIA FESTIVAL: Pierre Monteux conducts the Chicago Symphony and Issac Stern plays his fiddle to open the 24th festival in Chicago's Highland Park on June 30. Walter Hendl, Carlos Chavez, Vladimar Golschmann and Andre Cluytens will handle the baton duties from there on. The New York City Ballet will make its first visit in the final week Aug. 10-15. Soloists include pianists Rudolf Firkusny, Byron Janis and Leon Fleisher, tenor Richard and Piero Mirando-Ferraro.

CINCINNATI SUMMER OPERA: Nine operas fill the 38th season at the Zoo Pavilion. Verdi's "Aida" opens tonight with Mary Curtis-Verna in the title role, Nell Rankin, Constantine Ego and Piero Mirando-Ferraro. 250 miles.

The other productions which play twice each week are Puccini's "Tosca" and "Madame Butterfly," Bizet's "Carmen," Giordano's "Andrea Chenier," Rossini's "Barber of Seville," Carlisle Floyd's "Susannah," and Puccini's "Manon Lescaut" and "La Boheme." 250 miles.

CHAUTAUQUA: Two American operas, Vittorio Giannini's "The Taming of the Shrew" and Carlisle Floyd's "Wuthering Heights" highlight the six-week opera season which opens July 17 at the upstate New York culture center. Other productions — all in English—are Puccini's "Madame Butterfly," Verdi's "Rigoletto" and Smetana's "The Bartered Bride." The Broadway musical "Brigadoon" will also be presented. 150 miles.

Summer Music Season

Leonard Bernstein, that gifted missionary, will be conductor and soloist Monday, June 22, as New York's Lewisohn Stadium concert series enters its 42nd year. Along with the Boston Pops series, the Lewisohn concerts might be said to have established the main line of summer music-making.

Perhaps on the theory that summer listening like summer eating demands simple fare, programming tends to avoid the bulkier standard offerings. Semi and light classics are staples, and there is often more of Hollywood, Broadway and Tin Pan Alley than of the traditional Three B's.

Concerts given at Ravinia Park near Chicago, at Robin Hood Dell in Philadelphia, at the Watergate in Washington, at Red Rocks outside Denver, at the Bowl near Hollywood are all more or less of this type. Besides attracting huge audiences in their own right, these summer pops programs have generally been credited with preparing a wider public for the weightier sonorities of the winter season.

Oddly enough, a radically different approach also flowers in the summer's heat. Vacation music festivals, of which the 23-year-old Tanglewood Festival at Lennox, Mass., is the best known, aren't afraid of the heaviest stuff. In fact, arcane and estoteric works far outnumber the standards.

For example, this year's Caramoor festival at Katoonah, N.Y., (June 20-July 5) will feautre 15th and 16th Century English and Flemish outdoor music by the Pro Musica Motet. Winston-Salem, N.C., is offering (June 22-28) a festival and seminar devoted exclusively to early American music. Marlboro, Vt., specializes in chamber music, Carmel, Calif., in the lesser-known works of J. S. Bach. Aspen, Colo., which lured Albert Schweitzer to its Goethe bi-centennial in 1949, is attracting more and more listeners each season despite an out-of-the-way location and the frequent abstruseness of its programs.

Festivals Serve Up Culture

Summer festival time is here again and the celebrated centers of vacation culture have again prepared musical menus which will tempt Clevelanders to hit the festival trail.

Attractions within fairly convenient driving distance of Cleveland are:

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL: New England's annual contribution at Lenox, Mass., again offers Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux conducting the Boston Symphony. The Tanglewood season runs from July 1 to Aug. 9, and has as its best feature this year the Berlioz "Requiem" with tenor John McCollum as soloist.

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the Beaux Arts Trio of New York and pianist Rudolf Serkin and violinist Issac Stern are other notables. Also listed are pianists Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer and Lukas Foss and violinist Ruth Posselt. 510 miles.

STRATFORD FESTIVAL: The big musical event at the seventh Canadian splurge is the production of Offenbach's comic opera "Orpheus in the Underworld." John McCollum, Martial Singher and Irene Jordan have the leads and Louis Applebaum will conduct. Russian pianist Lev Oborin will make his North American debut.

The Shakespeare drama this year will be "As You Like It" and "Othello." Chamber and folk music, international film offerings, Robert Kemp's "The Heart is Highland" and a new revue also are scheduled between June 29 and Sept. 19. 315 miles.

RAVINIA FESTIVAL: Pierre Monteux conducts the Chicago Symphony and Issac Stern plays his fiddle to open the 24th festival in Chicago's Highland Park on June 30. Walter Hendl, Carlos Chavez, Vladimar Golschmann and Andre Cluytens will handle the baton duties from there on. The New York City Ballet will make its first visit in the final week Aug. 10-15. Soloists include pianists Rudolf Firkusny, Byron Janis and Leon Fleisher, tenor Richard and Piero Mirando-Ferraro.

CINCINNATI SUMMER OPERA: Nine operas fill the 38th season at the Zoo Pavilion. Verdi's "Aida" opens tonight with Mary Curtis-Verna in the title role, Nell Rankin, Constantine Ego and Piero Mirando-Ferraro. 250 miles.

The other productions which play twice each week are Puccini's "Tosca" and "Madame Butterfly," Bizet's "Carmen," Giordano's "Andrea Chenier," Rossini's "Barber of Seville," Carlisle Floyd's "Susannah," and Puccini's "Manon Lescaut" and "La Boheme." 250 miles.

CHAUTAUQUA: Two American operas, Vittorio Giannini's "The Taming of the Shrew" and Carlisle Floyd's "Wuthering Heights" highlight the six-week opera season which opens July 17 at the upstate New York culture center. Other productions — all in English—are Puccini's "Madame Butterfly," Verdi's "Rigoletto" and Smetana's "The Bartered Bride." The Broadway musical "Brigadoon" will also be presented. 130 miles.

Summer Music Season

Leonard Bernstein, that gifted missionary, will be conductor and soloist Monday, June 22, as New York's Lewisohn Stadium concert series opens its 42nd year. Along with the Boston Pops series, the Lewisohn concerts might be said to have established the main line of summer music-making.

Perhaps on the theory that summer listening like summer eating demands simple fare, programming tends to avoid the bulkier standard offerings. Semi and light classics are staples, and there is often more of Hollywood, Broadway and Tin Pan Alley than of the traditional Three B's.

Concerts given at Ravinia Park near Chicago, at Robin Hood Dell in Philadelphia, at the Watergate in Washington, at Red Rocks outside Denver, at the Bowl near Hollywood are all more or less of this type. Besides attracting huge audiences in their own right, these summer pops programs have generally been credited with preparing a wider public for the weightier sonorities of the winter season.

Oddly enough, a radically different approach also flowers in the summer's heat. Vacation music festivals, of which the 23-year-old Tanglewood Festival at Lennox, Mass., is the best known, aren't afraid of the heaviest stuff. In fact, arcane and estoteric works far outnumber the standards.

For example, this year's Caramoor festival at Katoonah, N.Y., (June 20-July 5) will feautre 15th and 16th Century English and Flemish outdoor music by the Pro Musica Motet. Winston-Salem, N.C., is offering (June 22-28) a festival and seminar devoted exclusively to early American music. Marlboro, Vt., specializes in chamber music, Carmel, Calif., in the lesser-known works of J. S. Bach. Aspen, Colo., which lured Albert Schweitzer to its Goethe bi-centennial in 1949, is attracting more and more listeners each season despite an out-of-the-way location and the frequent abstruseness of its programs.

Festival Concerts Will Begin July 1 at Tanglewood

THE 1959 Berkshire Festival will open July 1 and continue through Aug. 9. The festival comprises concerts in various series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its summer home at Tanglewood in Lenox. Also at Tanglewood is the Berkshire Music Center, established to provide a center where young musicians can continue their professional training and add to their experience under the guidance of eminent artists.

Tanglewood is a beautiful estate in the Berkshire Hills, given to the orchestra in 1936. The spacious grouunds open to visitors make the Berkshire Festival an especially attractive goal for a summer journey, besides the opportunity of hearing concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and guest artists. The Music Shed where the major symphony programs are given was designed in 1938 by the Finnish architect, Eliel Saarinen. The huge wedge-shaped shed seats 6,000, and beyond its open sides audiences can hear the music on the tree-shaded lawns of Tanglewood.

Six Chamber Music concerts will be given this summer in the Theater - Concert Hall on Wednesday evenings at 8:30 from July 1 through Aug. 5. featuring the music of Bach and Mozart.

Six weekend concert series will be given in the Musie Shed with programs Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon on each weekend beginning July 3. Three weekends will be devoted to the work of one composer: Bach on July 3-5; Mozart, July 10-12; and Beethoven, Aug. 7-9. Classical and modern composers will be heard during the concert programs of the other three weekend series. On Aug. 6, a special annual program is scheduled, Tanglewood on Parade, with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be its music director, Charles Munch. Mr. Munch will conduct all the weekend concerts except those of July 19 and 24, and Aug. 1 and 8, when Pierre Monteux will conduct. Soloists will include Rudolph Serkin, piano, Isaac Stern, violinist, Nicole Henriot-Schweizer, piano, Ruth Posselt, violin, as well as John McCollum, tenor, Adele Addison, soprano, Florence Kopleff, alto, Blake Stern, tenor, and Donald Gramm, bass.

Azalea Fields At Pittsfield Near Peak Of Brilliance

PITTSFIELD, Mass. — The azalea fields at Pittsfield State Forest, one of New England's most colorful displays, are nearing their peak and will provide a brilliant show in the Berkshire Hills for the next couple of weeks.

The azalea fields, largest of their kind in New England, are located just eight miles from the center of Pittsfield in the heart of the Berkshires. They may be reached over a hard-surfaced road which for three miles follows the brink of heavily-forested Lulu Cascade.

The pink flowering trees cover 100 acres of lawn surrounding Berry Pond atop a 2,000-foot peak. The azalea bushes, from two to 15 feet high, line the shores of the pond and cover several miles around the pond. This unspoiled area of the Berkshires was unknown to the public until 1934, when it was discovered by Civilian Conservation Corps workers.

The azalea fields are believed to have resulted from natural gardens started by William Berry, a Revolutionary War soldier who received the grant of land for his services in the Continental Army.

The azalea show is the annual season opener for the Berkshires' vacation attractions, which feature a pleasing mixture of nature and culture.

The Berkshires' most famous cultural attraction, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival, will open at Tanglewood in Lenox July 1 and close Aug. 9. Dr. Charles Munch, music director of the BSO, will conduct 14 of the 18 Festival conderts. Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's conductor emeritus, will direct one concert on each of the last four weekends of the season.

The annual Bach-Mozart concerts will be held on the first two weekends—July 3-5 and 10-12, with performances Friday and Saturday evenings at 8:30 and Sunday afternoons at 2:30. The works of great composers will be featured on the last four weekends: Tchaikovsky, July 17-19; Brahms, July 24-26; Berlioz, Mendelssohn and Schumann, July 31-Aug. 2, and Beethoven, Aug. 7-9. Chamber music concerts will be presented every Wednesday evening from July 1 through Aug. 5 at 8:30.

If you like your music with a more modern beat, you will appreciate the menu at Music Barn, only a half mile from the Tanglewood grounds in Lenox. Louis Armstrong and his group will open the fifth season of the Berkshire Music Barn the evening of June 28, a Sunday. Music Barn offers a schedule of jazz and folk music concerts through Sept. 6 this season.

Gospel singer Mahalia Jackson will present a concert the evening of July 2, and on the afternoon of July 4, the Music Barn will have Odetta in a program of blues and folk songs. The Fourth of July weekend program will conclude July 5 with an evening concert by the George Shearing Quintet.

Ted Shawn's Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival will open its 27th season June 30 and will run through Aug. 29. The opening Pillow program—June 30-Aug. 4—will include Pearl Lang and Dance Company in "Falls the Shadow," Ruth St. Denis in her newest work, "The Blue Mdaonna of St. Marks," and Alvin Allen & Co. in "Blues" and "Latin American Sketches."

The Ballet Rambert of London, England's oldest company, will make its United States debut at Jacob's Pillow this season, giving 24 performances from July 14 through Aug. 1.

In the southern Berkshire town of Stockbridge, the Berkshire Playhouse will open a 10-week season July 6 with "Time Remembered," and the Williamstown Theater in the college town of the same name will raise the curtain for an eight-week season July 3, opening with "Auntie Mame."

Another Berkshire Hills favorite the July Fourth Firemen's Muster in Pittsfield, will open a five-day program June 30. The muster closes July 4 with a gigantic parade, followed by competitions between volunteer fire companies in ladder and hose cart races and band and drum corps drills.

More detailed information on what to see and do in the Berkshires may be secured by writing the Berkshire Hills Conference, 50 South St., Pittsfield. Circle tour folders outlining suggested automobile tours of Berkshire County, with map, also may be secured on request.

Telegram Music Critic

An impressive array of soloists has been scheduled for the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, which opens July 1 and closes August 9.

Rudolf Serkin, pianist, will appear on three separate programs as will Isaac Stern, violinist.

The pianist's assignments are Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 (July 26); Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto No. 1 and Schumann's Concert Piece, Opus 92 (Aug. 1); and Beethoven's Choral Fantasy with Piano and Piano Concerto No. 4 (Aug. 7).

Violin Concertos

Stern will be soloist in the violin Concertos of Tchaikovsky (July 18); Brahms (July 24) and Mendelssohn (Aug. 2).

Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, the young French pianist, will be soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in G major, K.543, on July 10, and will appear again on Sunday afternoon, July 19 in D'Indy's Symphony on a French Mountain Air.

The evening of July 4 will be celebrated by the Boston Symphony and Charles Munch with concertos for one, two and three pianos by Johann Sebastian Bach. Soloists will be Lukas Foss, Bernard Zighera and Ralph Berkowitz.

Suite by Bach

Doriot Anthony Dwyer, first flute of the Boston Symphony, will solo in Bach's Suite No. 2 (July 3), and Ralph Gomberg, principal oboe, will be heard with Ruth Posselt, violinist, in Bach's Concerto for Violin and Oboe (July 5).

Soprano Bethany Beardslee will be in Bach's Cantata No. 51 ("Jauchzet Gott in Allen Landen"), assisted by Roger Voisin, trumpet (July 5). John McCollum, tenor, will appear in Berlioz Requiem (July 31).

The vocal quartet to be heard in the Mozart Requiem (July 12) and Beethoven's Ninth (Aug. 9) will include Adele Addison, soprano; Florence Kopleff, alto; Blake Stern, tenor, and Donald Gramm, bass.

With the exception of Miss Beardslee, all of these soloists have been heard at Tanglewood many, many times.

Short Cut to Fame

No amount of money or personal influence could have accomplished as much for Jaime Laredo as his recent winning of the Queen Elizabeth of Belgium competition.

The 18-year-old violinist from Bolivia triumphed over dozens of applicants from all over the world in what is known as "the most celebrated musical contest in the Western World."

Judges included Yehudi Menuhin, Zino Francescatti, David Oistrakh, and Arthur Grumiaux.

The cash award of $3,000 is a pittance compared to the "open Sesame" into the offices of managements, to automatic engagements, and publicity.

In addition, Laredo can claim to be the only violinist from South America to ever achieve international recognition.

Jacob's Pillow

The Jacob's Pillow Dances Festival opens June 30-July 4, with seven showings. Evening performances (9:00) will be Tues. Wed. Fri. and Sat. — matinees (4:00) Thurs. Fri. and Sat.

Opening program stars Pearl Lang and Co., "Falls and Shadow' '(Kupferman-Lang); Ruth St. Denis in "Blue Madonna of St. Marks"; and Alvin Ailey & Co., in "Blues" and "Latin American Sketches."

Tickets may be obtained by writing the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, Box 90, Lee, Mass. or telephoning the box-office.

The Echo 6/23/59

Berkshire Festival Opens On July 1st

In more senses than one the most important center of musical activity in mid-summer on this side of the world is Tanglewood at Lenox in the Berkshire Hills of western Massachusetts. The two hundred acres of Tanglewood are the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and it is there for six weeks, July 1st through August 8th, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its famous conductor, Charles Munch, presents the Berkshire Festival concerts before many thousands in the great semi-open Music Shed. It is here, also, that the principals of the Boston orchestra, together with other members of a disinguished faculty, hold the annual session of the Berkshire Music Center, a school for "living and working in music." The school offers rare opportunities for music performance and for study and for hearing music as well.

The Berkshire Music Center school was begun in 1940 as a realization of a long cherished project envisioned by Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's late conductor. Charles Munch is the Director of the Center and Aaron Copland, prominent American composer, serves as chairman of the Faculty. Ralph Berkowitz, noted pianist and lecturer, is Dean. The school comprises five departments: instrumental, choral, composition, opera (suspended for 1959), and the Tanglewood Study Group, primarily for the amateur, teacher, or music enthusiast.

Tanglewood has literary and historical associations from the past, as well as musical associations in the present. It is once the meeting place of Emerson, Holmes, Melville and Nathaniel Hawthorne. It was here that Hawthorne lived in 1850 and 1851, and first imagined his Tanglewood Tales, which he told to his children. Here also he wrote The House of Seven Gables. The "Little Red House," in which he lived and worked, has been rebuilt in replica. Although the place of intensive musical activities, Tanglewood, with its lawns, great trees and lake shore, is a beautiful scenic spot.

The Summer Music Season

Leonard Bernstein, that gifted missionary, was the conductor and soloist Monday evening as New York City's Lewisohn Stadium concert series entered its 42nd year. Together with the Boston Pops series, the Lewisohn concerts might be said to have established the main line of summer music-making.

Perhaps on the theory that summer listening like summer eating demands simple fare, programming tends to avoid the bulkier standard offerings. Semi and light classics are staples, and there is often more of Hollywood, Broadway and Tin Pan Alley than of the traditional Three B's—not to mention Le Jazz Hot and Cool in such well-established locales as Newport.

Concerts given at Ravina Park near Chicago, at Robin Hood Dell in Philadelphia, at the Watergate in Washington, at Red Rocks outside Denver, at the Bowl near Hollywood are all more or less of this type. Besides attracting large audiences in their own right, these summer pops programs have generally been credited with preparing a wider public for the heavier sonorities of the winter season.

Oddly enough, a radically different approach also flowers in the summer's heat. Vacation music festivals, of which the 23-year-old Tanglewood Festival at Lennox, Mass., is the best known, aren't afraid of the heavier stuff. In fact, arcane and esoteric works far outnumber the standards.

For example, this year's Caramoor Festival at Katonah, N. Y. (June 20-July 5) will feature 15th and 16th Century English and Flemish outdoor music by the Pro Musica Motet. Winston-Salem, N. C., is offering this week a festival and seminar devoted exclusively to early American music. Marlboro, Vt., specializes in chamber music, Carmel, Calif., in the lesser known works of J. S. Bach. Aspen, Colo., which lured Albert Schweitzer to its Goethe bicentennial in 1949, is attracting more and more listeners each season despite an out-of-the-way location and the frequent abstruseness of its programs.

Virginia, it will be observed, is conspicuous by its absence in the summer music picture. There's little going on in this area and only minor activity in the larger Old Dominion cities. In the matter of allied cultural undertakings—the outdoor dramas, for example—we're more fortunate. And they have their tuneful moments. Luckily for those music lovers who want their listening "live" every now and then, Washington and Baltimore are not too remote for a day's motoring.

Festivals of Music, Drama and Art Offer Varied Summer Entertainment

Mark Twain once said "there is a sumptuous variety about the New England weather, that compels the stranger's admiration. "Weather permitting, summer residents and tourists will be pouring into New England again this summer as America's "cradle of culture" offers an expanding variety of attractions in the areas of music, drama and the fine arts.

As the northeastern states witness additions to the type and number of such cultural attractions, the orbit of artist and music lover swings away from New York City into New England a little more each summer.

Symphony and summer stock, along with the ubiquitous art exhibits have held the center of the stage since the automobile first brought "entertainment under the stars" closer to the average city dweller. Jazz festivals have been more recent additions, and this year, at least one folk song session will take its place among the seven lively arts.

The musical spotlight will again be focused on the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., with the Boston Symphony orchestra, under its brilliant musical director, Dr. Charles Munch, as the magnet drawing its annual tens of thousands to the open air music shed.

The Tanglewood Season

Dr. Munch has announced a six weeks' season of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Tanglewood's music shed and two series of chamber music events, opening July 3 and continuing through August 9.

Dr. Munch will conduct two series of concerts by a chamber music orchestra from the Boston Symphony, as the season opener on July 3, 4 and 5 and July 10, 11 and 12, to be held in the theatre-concert hall. The Friday and Saturday evening concerts in the series are scheduled for 8:30 and the Sunday weekend will be devoted to the works of Bach and the second, Mozart. Outstanding soloists will appear.

On July 17, the full Boston Symphony orchestra will take over the Music Shed for twelve symphonic concerts to be given weekends over the remaining four weeks period. Dr. Munch will be on the podium for eight of these events, with four concerts to be conducted by Pierre Monteaus, conductor emeritus of the orchestra. Music of a different composer will be featured on each festival weekend, beginning with Tchaikowsky on July 17, followed by Brahms, composers of the Romantic school, and Beethoven during the final weekend. Heading the list of distinguished soloists will be Isaac Stern and Rudolph Serkin.

In addition to these two series, the Tanglewood season will offer six Wednesday evening chamber music concerts featuring contemporary chamber music with programs given by such leading ensembles as the Kroll Quartet, New York ProMusica, Beau Arts Trio, Bel Arte Trio and others appearing in the Fromm Foundation series.

The 200-acre Tanglewood site, dominated by its impressive music shed, which annually attracts thousands of music lovers from throughout the country and abroad, is located on Route 183, just east of Lenox and Route 7.

Music Lovers Will Like Trip To Tanglewood

This suggestion involves a pleasant trip of 135 miles to a spot with literary and musical overtones, Tanglewood in the Berkshires. Here the Boston Symphony appears every summer in a series of concerts.

The first part of the trip is to Canaan via U.S. 44 to the northwest corner of the state at the junction of U.S. Route 7 and 44.

Twelve miles north on U.S. 7 is Great Barrington, a summer and winter vacation resort center. Just before entering the town the party passes the fair grounds where the annual fair in September is one of the state's biggest.

A few miles beyond town Route 183 angles off to the left. After a few more miles Route 183 crosses Route 102 and curves around a beautiful lake known as the Stockbridge Bowl, about three miles out of Lenox. Now the group approaches the Dixey Estate, the site of the Berkshire Music Festival and the location of the little red house in which Nathaniel Hawthorn wrote his famous book "The House of the Seven Gables," as well as his "Tanglewood Tales."

On this estate, now owned by the Boston Symphony, is the music shed where concerts are given. Two types of accommodations are available. Some prefer to be in the music shed itself closer to the music and seated but many like the beautiful grounds outside where they may loll at ease or even walk around if it pleases them.

A visit offers an entertaining spectacle, even in addition to the music. Those who prefer to be outside the shed present an amazing contrast in costumes covering almost the entire field of attire. The first-time visitor is apt to get the impression that this is a giant "come as you are" party where everyone arrives garbed as they were when the invitation was received.

The view from the grounds is close to spectacular, and the visitor might be advised to attend the Sunday concert, picnic on the grounds after it, and then take a short tour. The formal garden is a must on the list.

Leaving, the party heads into Lenox and then south on U.S. 20 for a dozen miles to Becket where U.S. 20 cuts east, but the party heads south on Route 8. About 13 miles from here near New Boston is a view of Hanging Mountain, a perpendicular cliff about 300 feet high. Jutting out above the base are masses of rock that appear ready to plunge into the Farmington River. Fragments loosened by the rain and frost do sometimes come crashing down with tremendous force.

Route 8 continues south to Winsted and then it's U.S. Route 44 back to Hartford.

The new Berkshire Thruway linking the New York Thurway about 10 miles south of Albany with the Massachusetts Turnpike should prove a boon to New Jerseyites vacationing in the Berkshire Mountains this summer. Although the newly opened thruway may be a longer drive to the area than the Taconic State Parkway across the Hudson, New Jersey motorists will find no traffic lights along the route and few if any delays. The Garden State Parkway joins directly with the New York Thurway a few miles above the state border .

The new Berkshire Thruway also will be a help to New Jersey lovers of music and the dance who attend the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., and the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival at near-by Lee. The Tanglewood concerts start Wednesday and conclude Aug. 7 while the 27th annual dance program at Jacob's Pillow will get under way Tuesday and continue through Aug. 29.

The concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons in the Music Shed at Tanglewood with such outstanding soloists as Rudolph Serkin, pianist, and Isaac Stern, violinist giving special performances. The usual Wednesday evening chamber music series also has been arranged by Charles Munch, the orchestra's music director. Dr. Munch has invited Pierre Monteaux to conduct four of the Boston Symphony concerts this season on July 19, 24; Aug. 1 and 8.

Ted Shawn has arranged a record total of 60 performances for the dance festival this season. He has announced that England's Ballet Rambert will make its American debut at Jacob's Pillow on July 14 and will give 24 performances at the famed Berkshire's summer dance mecca during its three weeks' engagement. The ballet company presently is appearing at the Sadler's Wells Theater in London. The ballet Rambert, with 21 artists, will not only dance such classics as "Giselle" and "Coppelia" (both complete versions), but also will do a number of contemporary English works entirely new to American audiences.

Culture, With A Capital C

It is time for the annual reminder that New England's big season of Culture is at hand. We have to confess that it has its overwhelming moments. In fact, it is with trepidation that we even begin mentioning some of the local festivals, exhibits, and other programs dedicated to the arts, for fear of forgetting half of them.

Still it's a pity to let the summer flow by without making the most of the opportunity to get noses away from the grindstone, hands out of the garden loam, and eyes off the TV set. There are all kinds of things — art, music, theatre, dance — and they're highbrow, lowbrow, ancient and modern. The point is to take in what you may reasonably expect to enjoy, not what someone thinks would be good for you.

There are plays at Mountain Park Casino, musical comedy at Storrowton, the world's best dancing at Jacob's Pillow, jazz at Lenox, the Boston Symphony playing the great masters at the Tanglewood Music Shed, and also at Tanglewood chamber music old and modern and all kinds of other music. The Berkshires at this time are bulging with other musical programs, art exhibits, and theatres.

It's a good chance to try something you're not familiar with. The evenings are pleasant, the driving is easy, and the scenery is magnificent. You can afford to risk a couple of hours on something that may turn out to be a door opening to a new kind of pleasure.

What's especially great about it is that summer hereabouts lets us see again the terrific difference between live performance and the kind the vacuum tubes give us, between real paintings and the pages of Life. The direct contact has no substitute. There is something to be said, also, for the experience of being part of an audience at a successful musical or dramatic production, for there is [illegible]d of participation that adds [illegible] to the occasion.

Summer is show time, concert time, time for pleasure and applause. Make the most of it, for it doesn't last long.

Tanglewood Opens Tomorrow

The eternal Shakespeare

A short trip to Stratford, Connecticut, and you will be able to attend the American Shakespeare Festival which will perform from June 5th through August 9th. Even though you may not be a devotee, it is really worth while to see this remarkable theater with its fine appointments—which in no way seem to interfere with the old English tradition of shields, coats-of-arms, banners—and the very different stage construction which allows the performers to leave the stage by walking toward the audience and down under it. Romeo and Juliet, The Merry Wives of Windsor, All's Well that Ends Well, and A Midsummer Night's Dream will be performed. Additional repertory performances will be given through September 13th.

Berkshire Festival, Boston Symphony

As we have often done, you could easily drive on to Lenox, Mass. There the Berkshire Festival will be held from July 1st to August 9th. The Boston Symphony will give 18 concerts, 14 of which will be conducted by Charles Munch, the remaining four by Pierre Monteux. There will be a special presentation called "Tanglewood on Parade" featuring Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra. Here you will enjoy your music from a seat on the lawn, perhaps under one of the many great shade trees, or if you prefer, from inside the huge auditorium. And the countryside abounds with excellent restaurants and tea rooms.

Tanglewood Lectures Open To Friends

TANGLEWOOD — Friends of the Berkshire Music Center are invited to attend two series of lectures at Tanglewood during the current session of the school. The lectures will be presented on Wednesday and Friday afternoons at 3:15 in the Chamber Music Hall.

The opening lecture in the Wednesday series was given today by Ralph Berkowitz, dean of the Berkshire Music Center, who spoke on "The Tanglewood Idea."

The Friday afternoon series, entitled "A Seminar in Contemporary Music," will be devoted to talks by noted composers. Each lecture will be followed by a musical program performed by Fromm Fellowship Players — a group of young professional musicians attending the Berkshire Music Center for special work and study in contemporary music. The lecture this Friday afternoon will be given by Leon Kirchner, a member of the composition faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, who will speak on "Materials of Musical Composition."

Mr. Kirchner was born in Brooklyn and grew up in Los Angeles, Calif. He studied composition with Arnold Schoenberg, Ernest Bloch and Roger Sessions and has won many awards, including two Guggenheim Fellowships, the New York Music Critics Award, a grant from the National Academy of Arts and Letters and the Naumburg Foundation Award. He is currently professor of music at Mills College, Oakland, Calif.

Future lectures in the Seminar in Contemporary Music will be given by Aaron Copland (July 10); Lukas Foss (July 17); Gunther Schuller (July 24); Robert Craft July 31) and Ernst Krenek (August 7).

Helpful Tips To Aid Tanglewood Music Fans

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Tanglewood will resume operations this weekend and those who plan to journey to the Berkshire Music Festival this summer may be interested in a few helpful suggestions.

First of all, if you enjoy the scenic beauty of the Berkshires, I would suggest you take Route 44 up to Winsted and then shift to Route 8, which takes you directly to Lenox, Massachusetts. This is not as fast as Route 7 leading out of Canaan but it is considerably more rewarding for those who love the natural beauty of this part of Western Massachusetts.

The trip itself takes about two hours (even the new highway from Springfield only cuts about fifteen minutes), and it is a good idea to choose the most scenic route. Traveling at night, Route 7 is a preferable since you can make better time on less curvaceous roads.

Sunday Concerts at 2:30

Sunday concerts begin at 2:30 p.m. (those on Friday and Saturday start at 8:30 p.m.), and this is the least hectic arrangement for most people. You can stroll around the spacious Festival area and absorb the pastoral atmosphere after the concert and thereby miss the usual traffic tie-up. There is ample, free parking space; the only difficulty is getting out in a hurry, unless you leave a little early.

Those who want to eat a lunch in this pleasant setting may do so. You may bring your own or buy from the pavilion which serves a complete meal (the prices are inclined to be a little high). There is an area where picnic tables are available.

Lest we forget the most important aspect — the music, it should be remembered that the first two weekends are traditionally devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart (in that order). These concerts are given, as a rule, in the Theater-Concert Hall that seats 1500, (rather than in the Shed that seats several thousands).

Sit Outside On Lawn

You can sit on the lawn for two dollars (seats in the Shed range from $2.50 to $5.50), but you run the hazard of sudden showers. However, the management allows several hundred to stand under the shelter of the Shed behind the seated customers if rain begins to fall.

There is one important piece of advice for those who prefer to sit on the lawn. If you want to hear the music with the greatest fidelity, choose a spot as directly in front of the Shed as possible. Although Tanglewood is advertising a new acoustical improvement this year, I have found that sitting too far from direct front is not good. Too much of the orchestral detail is lost.

In addition to the concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall and the Shed (the regular Shed concerts begin on July 17th), there is a Chamber Music Series on Wednesday nights that this year features the Kroll String Quartet, the Beaux Arts Trio, the New York Pro Musica, and others.

Berkshires Offer Host Of Vacation Selections

Classical Music, Jazz, Theater Productions, Camping or Luxury Living All Available

Many places vie for the title "Vacationland," but none can exceed the diversity of recreation to be found in the 942 square miles of wooded beauty and cultural delights which is Berkshire County.

Variety Abounds

Bounding the Commonwealth of the west, from the rugged Vermont country in the north to the Connecticut hills in the south, "The Berkshires" come close to being all things to all people.

This will undoubtedly come as news to those who have thought of the area as a rugged, campers' country — good for fishing and hunting and roughing it in general, but probably no place for one who prefers the finer things in life.

But the finer things in life are available in great variety in the Berkshires. This week, to take a merely representative sampling, the Boston Symphony will perform Rimsky-Korsakov, Debussy and Tchaikovsky under the venerable Pierre Monteux, and Brahms and Piston under Charles Munch, in the indescribably beautiful setting at Tanglewood. There, too, will be the precise yet delicate violin mastery of Isaac Stern.

Not to dwell too long on the classical in music—still in the week will be heard the Bel Arte Trio, Madelyn Vose and William Reynolds—for perhaps too much classical would leave the lover of the modern idiom feeling discouraged, and this will not happen in the Berkshires. For those who leave pear shaped tones to the squares, there is the Dave Brubeck Quartet, Sarah Vaughn and Tom Lehrer.

30 Productions Billed

For lovers of the legitimate theater, the finest acting talent has gathered to present "Picnic," "Pal Joey," "Diary of Anne Frank," "Charlie's Aunt" and "Howie." During the summer months, something over 30 full scale productions are mounted—certainly ample fare for the most demanding theatergoer. Should your theater preference turn toward the dance, however, Jacobs Pillow offers the incomparable Ruth St. Denis, Ted Shawn, the Ballet Rambert, Ballet Espanol Ximenez Vargas, Thomas Andrews, Jean Cebron and Baskar and Company.

Between evenings of watching, there is plenty to do when you would like to participate in your own entertainment. The country is dotted with lakes just fine for swimming or boating or bringing in bass, trout or perch. The woods vary from well-blazed trails for the tenderfoot to veritable "forests primeval" where it is possible to get dangerously lost, if you don't know how to manage.

The living can be as easy or as rugged as you wish. If you are a do-it-yourself camper, you can stay in one of the many state park campsites, where tentspace costs $1 a day. Or for the ultimate in do-nothing-yourself, there is the Berkshire Inn, the Curtis Hotel and myriad others catering to luxurious living.

Museums, Too

Afternoons may always be well spent in browsing through one of the museums. No backwoods trading posts these! The Clark Art Institute in Williamstown has an extensive collection of paintings, drawings, prints and sculpture by masters of six centuries. Similarly, the Berkshire Museum in Pittsfield, in addition to its old masters, has the magnificent Spalding Chinese collection.

So if you have thought of the Berkshires as a country cabin with oil lanterns, you owe it to yourself to get better acquainted with this most diversified of all vacationlands.

The eternal Shakespeare

A short trip to Stratford, Connecticut, and you will be able to attend the American Shakespeare Festival which will perform from June 5th through August 9th. Even though you may not be a devotee, it is really worth while to see this remarkable theater with its fine appointments—which in no way seem to interfere with the old English tradition of shields, coats-of-arms, banners—and the very different stage construction which allows the performers to leave the stage by walking toward the audience and down under it. Romeo and Juliet, The Merry Wives of Windsor, All's Well that Ends Well, and A Midsummer Night's Dream will be performed. Additional repertory performances will be given through September 13th.

Berkshire Festival, Boston Symphony

As we have often done, you could easily drive on to Lenox, Mass. There the Berkshire Festival will be held from July 1st to August 9th. The Boston Symphony will give 18 concerts, 14 of which will be conducted by Charles Munch, the remaining four by Pierre Monteux. There will be a special presentation called "Tanglewood on Parade" featuring Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra. Here you will enjoy your music from a seat on the lawn, perhaps under one of the many great shade trees, or if you prefer, from inside the huge auditorium. And the countryside abounds with excellent restaurants and tea rooms.

Tanglewood Lectures Open To Friends

TANGLEWOOD — Friends of the Berkshire Music Center are invited to attend two series of lectures at Tanglewood during the current session of the school. The lectures will be presented on Wednesday and Friday afternoons at 3:15 in the Chamber Music Hall.

The opening lecture in the Wednesday series was given today by Ralph Berkowitz, dean of the Berkshire Music Center, who spoke on "The Tanglewood Idea."

The Friday afternoon series, entitled "A Seminar in Contemporary Music," will be devoted to talks by noted composers. Each lecture will be followed by a musical program performed by Fromm Fellowship Players — a group of young professional musicians attending the Berkshire Music Center for special work and study in contemporary music. The lecture this Friday afternoon will be given by Leon Kirchner, a member of the composition faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, who will speak on "Materials of Musical Composition."

Mr. Kirchner was born in Brooklyn and grew up in Los Angeles, Calif. He studied composition with Arnold Schoenberg, Ernest Bloch and Roger Sessions and has won many awards, including two Guggenheim Fellowships, the New York Music Critics Award, a grant from the National Academy of Arts and Letters and the Naumburg Foundation Award. He is currently professor of music at Mills College, Oakland, Calif.

Future lectures in the Seminar in Contemporary Music will be given by Aaron Copland (July 10); Lukas Foss (July 17); Gunther Schuller (July 24); Robert Craft (July 31) and Ernst Krenek (Aug. 7).

Helpful Tips To Aid Tanglewood Music Fans

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Tanglewood will resume operations this weekend and those who plan to journey to the Berkshire Music Festival this summer may be interested in a few helpful suggestions.

First of all, if you enjoy the scenic beauty of the Berkshires, I would suggest you take Route 44 up to Winsted and then shift to Route 8, which takes you directly to Lenox, Massachusetts. This is not as fast as Route 7 leading out of Canaan but it is considerably more rewarding for those who love the natural beauty of this part of Western Massachusetts.

The trip itself takes about two hours (even the new highway from Springfield only cuts about fifteen minutes), and it is a good idea to choose the most scenic route. Traveling at night, Route 7 is a preferable since you can make better time on less curvaceous roads.

Sunday Concerts at 2:30

Sunday concerts begin at 2:30 p.m. (those on Friday and Saturday start at 8:30 p.m.), and this is the least hectic arrangement for most people. You can stroll around the spacious Festival area and absorb the pastoral atmosphere after the concert and thereby miss the usual traffic tie-up. There is ample, free parking space; the only difficulty is getting out in a hurry, unless you leave a little early.

Those who want to eat a lunch in this pleasant setting may do so. You may bring your own or buy from the pavilion which serves a complete meal (the prices are inclined to be a little high). There is an area where picnic tables are available.

Lest we forget the most important aspect — the music, it should be remembered that the first two weekends are traditionally devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart (in that order). These concerts are given, as a rule, in the Theater-Concert Hall that seats 1500, (rather than in the Shed that seats several thousands).

Although Tanglewood is advertising a new acoustical improvement this year, I have found that sitting too far from direct front is not good. Too much of the orchestral detail is lost.

Vacation Season Offers Wide Musical Choice

BY E. CLYDE WHITLOCK.

Musical enterprises of large dimensions and artistic consequence are available through July and August to vacation-bound seekers after inspiration, knowledge and improving entertainment.

E. CLYDE WHITLOCK.

Closest to us of the nationally dimensioned series is the summer-long program of the St. Louis Municipal Opera, with weekly changes of light opera offerings in their remarkable 12,000-seat outdoor theater in Forest Park. An innovation this year is that, though the place is outdoors, it is air-conditioned with enormous fans.

Coming events are: "Rio Rita," July 6-12; "Gentlemen Prefer Blonds," July 13-19; "Fanny," July 20-26; "Li'l Abner," July 27-Aug. 2; "Carmen," Aug. 3-9; "Call Me Madam," Aug. 10-16; "Babes in Toyland," Aug. 17-23, and "Bells Are Ringing," Aug. 24-Sept. 6.

The most august enterprise is the Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, N. Y., which will run from July 1 to Aug. 9.

CHAUTAUQUA AGAIN.

Charles Munch will conduct 14 orchestra concerts and Pierre Monteux two. There will be orchestra concerts each Friday, Saturday and Sunday night for six weeks, and chamber music on Wednesday. Rudolf Serkin, pianist, and Isaac Stern, violinist, will be the principal soloists. The first two trios of orchestra concerts will be devoted to Bach and Mozart, and thereafter to romantic and modern composers. There will be choral programs, and also opportunities for private study.

For its 85th season the venerable Chautauqua Institution will open a six-week orchestral season on July 18, to conclude Aug. 26. Walter Hendl, music director, will conduct for his seventh year concerts on Tuesday, Wednesday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons.

There are two featured series of orchestral concerts—a Beethoven cycle for Sunday afternoons and a series drawn from operettas and Broadway shows on Wednesday nights.

Julius Rudel, of the New York City Opera, will direct the Chautauqua opera season, which will present "Wuthering Heights," "The Taming of the Shrew," "Rigoletto," "The Bartered Bride," "Madame Butterfly" and "Brigadoon," all in English.

The Hollywood Bowl's 37th season will open July 8 with Jascha Heifetz, Eugene Ormandy and the Los Angeles Philharmonic. There will be symphonic concerts on Tuesday and Thursdays and pop concerts on Saturday.

CARMEL FESTIVAL.

At Red Rocks, outside Denver, in addition to orchestral concerts, "Die Walkuere" and "The Creation" will be sung, and Van Cliburn will play with the Denver Symphony.

The Esplanade outdoor concerts of the Boston Symphony will be conducted by Arthur Fiedler during July and early August.

The Carmel (Cal.) Bach Festival will be held from July 14 to 20 for its 21st season. Instrumental soloists will be heard with a Bach-sized chamber orchestra conducted by Sandor Salgo.

The 20th season of the Cleveland Summer Orchestra will offer 16 concerts from July to Aug. 30.

One of the most impressive and fastest growing of summer seasons is that of the Santa Fe Opera. In its third season, the company has presented Donizetti's "Anne Boleyn," which had been absent from the American stage for 112 years. The season includes 25 performances of six operas, all in English.

Puccini's "Madame Butterfly" will start July 8, Mozart's "Abduction from the Seraglio" July 10, Rossini's "Barber of Seville" July 22 and Marc Blitzstein's "Regina" July 29.

CATHEDRAL EVENT.

With the permission of Most Rev. Edwin V. Byrne, archbishop of Santa Fe, the Cathedral of St. Francis will be the setting of a performance of Stravinsky's "Threni," conducted by the composer, on July 12.

The Cincinnati Summer Opera, long known as the Zoo Opera, begins its five-week season on July 5 with "Der Rosenkavalier." Other operas are "Carmen," "Madame Butterfly," "La Traviata," "Boris Godunov," "L'Elisir d'Amore," "Faust," "Il Trovatore," "La Boheme," and "Lucia di Lammermoor."

The New York Stadium concerts, played mainly by members of the New York Philharmonic, began June 23 a season of six weeks, five concerts a week.

Central City, with its famous miniature opera house, is offering its 27th season through July, playing "Pagliacci," "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "La Perichole."

Robin Hood Dell in Philadelphia will continue its season, under various noted conductors, until July 31.

The Aspen Music Festival continues throughout July and August, with concerts each Wednesday and an American cycle July 19 to Aug. 3.

The Grant Park free series in Chicago will continue until Aug. 17, having Van Cliburn as soloist July 16 and 18.

Music Will Attract Many NE Tourists

Symphony, Jazz Vie At Lenox, Newport & Hub

Highlighting the contribution of music festivals to our recreational industries, New England resort operators are preparing for an influx of tourists and music devotees who are expected to attend a varied series of concerts in the New England area this summer. The concept of a music festival which started with the Tanglewood Concert Series has now mushroomed to include not only the devotees of classical music but also those of jazz. Along with this unique development has been a growing awareness by hotelmen and restaurateurs of the promotional possibilities implicit in these festivals.

Tanglewood Opens

The 22nd Music Festival at Tanglewood, annually attracting crowds of more than 30,000, opens July 4th weekend. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Charles Munch will present a series of Bach concerts on the first weekend commencing with the Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 3 and 6. The Festival, which will extend through August 9th, will feature on successive weekends the works of Mozart, Tchaikovsky, Brahms, Berlioz, Mendelssohn and Beethoven.

Berkshire Center

One of the most distinguished faculties ever assembled is treading the campus of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

Eleazar de Carvalho and Seymour Lipkin are in charge of the orchestral conducting department. Orchestral playing and chamber music are headed by Richard Burgin, assisted by William Kroll, violinist and head of the Kroll Quartet.

Teachers of instruments include Ruth Posselt, Alfred Krips, Joseph de Pasquale, Samuel Mayes, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Ralph Gomberg, James Stagliano, and Bernard Zighera.

Choral music is under the tutelage of Hugh Ross, Lorna Cooke deVaron and Alfred Nash Patterson. Aaron Copland is head of the composition faculty, working with Lukas Foss and Leon Kirchner.

Handel And Haydn

The big musical news item on March 30, 1815 was the founding of the Handel and Haydn Society in Boston. But it was seven years before the choral group came to Worcester. The occasion was a cattle show, on which occasion is sang in Worcester's Old South Church, on Sept. 25, 1822.

During the last many years, the Handel and Haydn Society has been synonymouus with the name of Dr. Thompson Stone, director.

Stone's successor has been named. He's Dr. Edward F. Gilday of Lowell State Teachers College, conductor of the Framingham Community Choral Society, and several Worcester choral group, including that of the St. Gabriel School of Music.

All of next season's Handel and Haydn Society concerts will be given in Symphony Hall, Boston. Dr. Gilday will conduct Handel's "The Messiah" on Dec. 6 and 13—and Dr. Stone (new conductor emeritus) on Dec. 14.

For the spring concert Dr. Gilday will conduct the Mozart Great Mass in C minor on Passion Sunday.

Helpful Tips To Aid Tanglewood Music Fans

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Tanglewood will resume operations this weekend and those who plan to journey to the Berkshire Music Festival this summer may be interested in a few helpful suggestions.

First of all, if you enjoy the scenic beauty of the Berkshires, I would suggest you take Route 44 up to Winsted and then shift to Route 8, which takes you directly to Lenox, Massachusetts. This is not as fast as Route 7 leading out of Canaan but it is considerably more rewarding for those who love the natural beauty of this part of Western Massachusetts.

The trip itself takes about two hours (even the new highway from Springfield only cuts about fifteen minutes), and it is a good idea to choose the most scenic route. Traveling at night, Route 7 is a preferable since you can make better time on less curvaceous roads.

Sunday Concerts at 2:30

Sunday concerts begin at 2:30 p.m. (those on Friday and Saturday start at 8:30 p.m.), and this is the least hectic arrangement for most people. You can stroll around the spacious Festival area and absorb the pastoral atmosphere after the concert and thereby miss the usual traffic tie-up. There is ample, free parking space; the only difficulty is getting out in a hurry, unless you leave a little early.

Those who want to eat a lunch in this pleasant setting may do so. You may bring your own or buy from the pavilion which serves a complete meal (the prices are inclined to be a little high). There is an area where picnic tables are available.

Lest we forget the most important aspect — the music, it should be remembered that the first two weekends are traditionally devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart (in that order). These concerts are given, as a rule, in the Theater-Concert Hall that seats 1500, (rather than in the Shed that seats several thousands).

Sit Outside On Lawn

You can sit on the lawn for two dollars (seats in the Shed range from $2.50 to $5.50), but you run the hazard of sudden showers. However, the management allows several hundred to stand under the shelter of the Shed behind the seated customers if rain begins to fall.

There is one important piece of advice for those who prefer to sit on the lawn. If you want to hear the music with the greatest fidelity, choose a spot as directly in front of the Shed as possible. Although Tanglewood is proclaiming a new acoustical improvement this year, I have found that sitting too far from direct front is not good. Too much of the orchestral detail is lost.

In addition to the concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall and the Shed (the regular Shed concerts begin on July 17th), there is a Chamber Music Series on Wednesday nights that this year features the Kroll String Quartet, the Beaux Arts Trio, the New York Pro Musica, and others.

Vacation Season Offers Wide Musical Choice

BY E. CLYDE WHITLOCK.

Musical enterprises of large dimensions and artistic consequence are available through July and August to vacation-bound seekers after inspiration, knowledge and improving entertainment.

E. CLYDE WHITLOCK.

Closest to us of the nationally dimensioned series is the summer-long program of the St. Louis Municipal Opera, with weekly changes of light opera offerings in their remarkable 12,000-seat outdoor theater in Forest Park. An innovation this year is that, though the place is outdoors, it is air-conditioned with enormous fans.

Coming events are: "Rio Rita," July 6-12; "Gentlemen Prefer Blonds," July 13-19; "Fanny," July 20-26; "Li'l Abner," July 27-Aug. 2; "Carmen," Aug. 3-9; "Call Me Madam," Aug. 10-16; "Babes in Toyland," Aug. 17-23, and "Bells Are Ringing," Aug. 24-Sept. 6.

The most august enterprise is the Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, N. Y., which will run from July 1 to Aug. 9.

CHAUTAUQUA AGAIN.

Charles Munch will conduct 14 orchestra concerts and Pierre Monteux two. There will be orchestra concerts each Friday, Saturday and Sunday night for six weeks, and chamber music on Wednesday. Rudolf Serkin, pianist, and Isaac Stern, violinist, will be the principal soloists. The first two trios of orchestra concerts will be devoted to Bach and Mozart, and thereafter to romantic and modern composers. There will be choral programs, and also opportunities for private study.

For its 35th season the venerable Chautauqua institution will open a six-week orchestral season on July 18, to conclude Aug. 26. Walter Hendl, music director, will conduct for his seventh year concerts on Tuesday, Wednesday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons.

There are two featured series of orchestral concerts—a Beethoven cycle for Sunday afternoons and a series drawn from operettas and Broadway shows on Wednesday nights.

Julius Rudel, of the New York City Opera, will direct the Chautauqua opera season, which will present "Wuthering Heights," "The Taming of the Shrew," "Rigoletto," "The Bartered Bride," "Madame Butterfly" and "Brigadoon," all in English.

The Hollywood Bowl's 37th season will open July 5 with Jascha Heifetz, Eugene Ormandy and the Los Angeles Philharmonic. There will be symphonic concerts on Tuesday and Thursdays and pop concerts on Saturday.

CARMEL FESTIVAL.

At Red Rocks, outside Denver, in addition to orchestral concerts, "Die Walkuere" and "The Creation" will be sung, and Van Cliburn will play with the Denver Symphony.

The Esplanade outdoor concerts of the Boston Symphony will be conducted by Arthur Fiedler during July and early August.

The Carmel (Cal.) Bach Festival will be held from July 14 to 20 for its 21st season. Instrumental soloists will be heard with a Bach-sized chamber orchestra conducted by Sandor Salgo.

The 20th season of the Cleveland Summer Orchestra will offer 16 concerts from July to Aug. 30.

One of the most impressive and fastest growing of summer seasons is that of the Santa Fe Opera. In its 3rd season, the company has presented Donizetti's "Anne Boleyn," which had been absent from the American stage for 112 years. The season includes 25 performances of six operas, all in English.

Puccini's "Madame Butterfly" will start July 8, Mozart's "Abduction from the Seraglio" July 10, Rossini's "Barber of Seville" July 22 and Marc Blitzstein's "Regina" July 29.

CATHEDRAL EVENT.

With the permission of Most Rev. Edwin V. Byrne, archbishop of Santa Fe, the Cathedral of St. Francis will be the setting of a performance of Stravinsky's "Threni," conducted by the composer, on July 12.

The Cincinnati Summer Opera, long known as the Zoo Opera, begins its five-week season on July 5 with "Der Rosenkavalier." Other operas are "Carmen," "Madame Butterfly," "La Traviata," "Boris Godunov," "L'Elisir d'Amore," "Faust," "Il Trovatore," "La Boheme," and "Lucia di Lammermoor."

The New York Stadium concerts, played mainly by members of the New York Philharmonic, began June 23 a season of six weeks, five concerts a week.

Central City, with its famous miniature opera house, is offering its 27th season through July, playing "Pagliacci," "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "La Perichole."

Robin Hood Dell in Philadelphia will continue its season, under various noted conductors, until July 31.

The Aspen Music Festival continues throughout July and August, with concerts each Wednesday and an American cycle July 19 to Aug. 2.

The Grant Park free series in Chicago will continue until Aug. 16, having Van Cliburn as soloist July 15 and 16.

Music Will Attract Many NE Tourists

Symphony, Jazz Vie At Lenox, Newport & Hub

Highlighting the contribution of music festivals to our recreational industries, New England resort operators are preparing for an influx of tourists and music devotees who are expected to attend a varied series of concerts in the New England area this summer. The concept of a music festival which started with the Tanglewood Concert Series has now mushroomed to include not only the devotees of classical music but also those of jazz. Along with this unique development has been a growing awareness by hotelmen and restaurateurs of the promotional possibilities implicit in these festivals.

Tanglewood Opens

The 22nd Music Festival at Tanglewood, annually attracting crowds of more than 30,000, opens July 4th weekend. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Charles Munch will present a series of Bach concerts on the first weekend commencing with the Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 3 and 6. The Festival, which will extend through August 9th, will feature on successive weekends the works of Mozart, Tchaikovsky, Brahms, Berlioz, Mendelssohn and Beethoven.

Dr. Munch, musical director of the BSO, this coming season at Tanglewood has included in the Berkshire Nights concerts on Friday evenings performances by the noted violinist, Isaac Stern, and the famed pianist, Rudolf Serkin, who drew a record breaking crowd of nearly 16,000 to Tanglewood a few years ago for one of his appearances with the BSO.

In Brief . . .

While only the technically trained could understand all the features of GE's "black box" program (even if they were made public), it is clear that the modernization plan calls for multimillion-dollar improvements to the local plant, and that is all to the good . . . One of the interesting points about expansion of the Barbieri Lumber Company into part of the unused Monument Mills property in Housatonic is that it carries out a recommendation by the A. D. Little Company in its survey of Berkshire's industrial prospects that more use be made of the county's timber resources . . . Planting a sizable tree like that 40-foot maple set down in Park Square yesterday has the big (though proportionately costly) advantage of leapfrogging the early years of growth. This one, which made many a home landscaper drool, has been growing for the past 20 years.

With a four-Friday program including soloists Rudolf Serkin and Isaac Stern, conductors Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, and a festival chorus presentation of Berlioz' "Requiem," the Berkshire Nights series will give a generous sampling of the best Tanglewood has to offer this season . . . It's amusing to see that the big-brother relationship between chambers of commerce and their junior counterparts does not preclude an outspoken Jaycee president from blasting "webfooted, swamp-Yankee thinking" among his seniors . . .

The City Council discussion preceding acceptance of the new sewer system authorization legislation indicates that clean-river proponents still have some proselyting to do among city fathers whose wards are comfortably distant from the Housatonic . . . Pittsfield has had its skiing, skating and baseball champions, but it is safe to say Charles Najimy is its first national judo titleholder. Banzai, Najimy-San! . . . Though saddening to New England traditionalists, soil conservationist Byron E. Titcomb's "case against stone walls" set out in yesterday's Berkshire Farmer column doubtless makes sense to practical farmers . . .

Anniversary

Berkshire Nights Committee Includes Festival Organizers

The living members of the original committee of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, which was started here 25 years ago, will be invited to serve as honorary members of the Berkshire Nights committee this season.

Mrs. John G. W. Mahanna, chairman of the Berkshire Nights committee, made the announcement to members of the Tanglewood Advisory Committee at a luncheon meeting today at the Hotel Wendell-Sherwood. She reported she received acceptances to serve as honorary chairmen from Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of Stockbridge, who pioneered the Festival idea and served as president from 1934 to 1956, when the corporation was dissolved, and from Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky of Lenox, widow of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 25 years and founder of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival plan was started in May, 1934, when the late Dr. Henry Hadley made known to Miss Robinson Smith "his dream" to give symphony concerts "under the stars" in Berkshire County.

On June 26, 1934, after Miss Robinson Smith met with 64 men and women from the Berkshire area at her summer home in Glendale, the festival plan was started and the first concerts were held at the Hanna Farm in Interlaken on the weekend of Aug. 23, 25 and 26.

Two years later when the Festival scene shifted to Holmwood, the Vanderbilt estate, now Foxhollow School, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, gave its first Festival concerts, drawing a crowd of 15,000 to the weekend performances.

Record Attendance

The following year the Festival was moved to the Tanglewood estate, where the number of BSO concerts was increased and all previous attendance records were broken. Since that time the Boston Symphony has made Tanglewood one of the greatest musical centers in the world, breaking all records last season, when 168,773 attended the BSO concerts at the Festival.

The Berkshire Nights subscription plan offers a subscription four consecutive Friday night concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Shed, the price for the four being the same as the normal series subscription of three concerts on Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

Closes June 1

The subscription closes on June 1.

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra, ever cognizant of the contribution of the Berkshire area residents to the tremendous success of the Berkshire Festival, inaugurated the Berkshire Nights plan two years ago," Mrs. Mahanna said. "This anniversary year is an appropriate time to make the Friday night series a real Berkshire event."

Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presided at today's meeting of the Tanglewood Advisory Committee and discussed other plans for the Festival season at Tanglewood, which runs from July 1 to Aug. 9.

Berkshire Nights Chairman Urges Support of Program

GREAT BARRINGTON — The Berkshire Nights concerts at Tanglewood were instituted for Berkshire County people and Berkshire County people should support them, Mrs. John G. W. Mahanna of Pittsfield told the Rotary Club here yesterday.

Mrs. Mahanna, chairman of the Berkshire Nights committee, briefly traced Tanglewood's history from its start 25 years ago on the former Dan Hanna farm in Stockbridge to the current remodeling of the famous Music Shed. For a short time, the concerts were held on the site of the present Foxhollow School, Mrs. Mahanna said. Then they moved to the present location and have been presented there since.

Aimed at Area Audiences

The Berkshire Nights program, started three years ago, Mrs. Mahanna explained, offers four Friday night concerts for the price of a weekend series of three concerts.

Friday nights were chosen, Mrs. Mahanna said, because the concerts are aimed primarily at local audiences within easy driving distance of Tanglewood. The construction of the Massachusetts Turnpike and the extension of parkways and turnpikes in New York state have enlarged the local audience to include persons from as far away as Springfield or Albany, N.Y., she said, but she pointed out that the aim of the program is still to bring Tanglewood within easy reach of Berkshire County residents.

The Berkshire Nights concerts have consistently included some of the best performances offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mrs. Mahanna said. This year's series includes performances of works by Berlioz, Tchaikovsky, Brahms, Strauss and Beethoven. Included is a presentation of the Berlioz "Requiem" which was given last week by the orchestra in Boston to close the Symphony Hall series.

Mrs. Mahanna was introduced to the Rotarians by Robert K. Wheeler, who also urged support of the series. He termed Tanglewood, the Berkshire Playhouse and Jacob's Pillow "the backbone of the resort business" in this area. As such, he said, they deserve support from persons in the county who derive their living from that business.

"Berkshire Nights is the best musical bargain there is," Mr. Wheeler said. He was supported by Mrs. Mahanna, who pointed out that a person who subscribes to the four concerts saves money even if he is able to attend only three of them.

"We hope our Berkshire people will support the program," she added.

Berkshire Nights Concerts Are Gaining in Popularity

The Berkshire Nights series of concerts on four consecutive Friday evenings in the Music Shed at Tanglewood appear to be gaining in popularity.

At a meeting of the Tanglewood Advisory Committee here yesterday, Mrs. John G. W. Mahanna, Berkshire Nights chairman, reported a 33 per cent increase over subscriptions at the same time last season.

The drive opened April 15 and will close June 1.

Mrs. Mahanna, encouraged by the early response to the Friday night series of concerts by the Boston Symphony, informed the committee that to date subscriptions total $1429.50, compared to $1074 last year at this time.

This season's Berkshire Nights concerts include the top artists of the Festival season: Dr. Charles Munch, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra; guest conductor, Pierre Monteux; violin soloist Isaac Stern; pianist Rudolf Serkin, and Berlioz' "Requiem," featuring John McCollum as tenor soloist with the full Berkshire Festival chorus.

Musik Festspiele in Tangelwood

Die Erfahrung lehrt, dass selbst drei erfolgreiche Festspiele keine Garantie fuer den Fortbestand der Konzerte bilden. Wir haben diese bittere Erfahrung in Ellenville machen muessen. Trotz des grossen kuenstlerischen Erfolges ist es finanziell nicht moeglich gewesen Ellenville's Kulturtat fuer den Empirestaat fortzusetzen. So blieb fuer den Liebhaber guter Musik wie seit vielen Jahren nichts, als nach Tangelwood zu pilgern. Reichlich entschaedigt, in der wundervollen Atmosphaere der Berkshires, bot sich dem Musikenthusiast das vollendete musikalische Ereignis, das Amerika bieten kann.

Wie in Ellenville das Symphony of the Air Orchestra, so ist in Tangelwood das Boston Symphony Orchestra unter Charles Munch die Basis, um das herum sich die vielen Auffuehrungen solistischer Art und Kammermusik gruppieren.

Es ist kaum zu disputieren, dass das von Serge Koussevitzky erzogene Boston Orchester heute das grossartigste Klanginstrument in den Vereinigten Staaten ist. Man konnte dies aufs Neue-speciell in der Streichergruppe -finden, die den Joh. Seb. Bach gewidmeten Konzerten den wirklichen Inhalt gaben. -Eine bis ins letzte hinein gefeilte Auffuehrung der H-moll-Messe von J. S. Bach war vielleicht der Hoehepunkt dieses "Bachfestival". Welch ein Unterschied, diese Messe in der freien Natur oder im Gotteshaus oder -Konzertsaal zu hoeren. Das Erlebnis Bach in der Freien Natur, mit strahlender Sonne durch gruene Baeume brechend zu hoeren, laesst die ungeheure Majestaet Bach-scher Musik, die Einigkeit wahrer Religion mit der Natur und Gott wach werden, in der Tat eines der selten grossen Erlebnisse, die der von Sorgen geplagte Mensch unserer Zeit erhoffen kann.

Ein anderes Program brachte alle 4 Suiten und ein drittes die selten zu hoerende "Kunst der Fuge". Einige Konzerte waren ausschliesslich Mozart geweiht. Es ist hier besonders zu erwaehnen, dass in Tangelwood Wert auf leicht zu verstehende klassische Musik gelegt wird, gewissermassen den Sommer, die klare Luft und die Musik in einem Ganzen zu verbinden. — Charles Munch bringt natuerlich auch moderne insbesondere franzoesische Musik, Ravel, Debussy, Milhaud und unsere Zeitgenossen Honegger, Bartok oder Aaron Copland sind vertreten. Eine Auswahl der besten Kammermusik wurde durch das Budapester Streichquartett, Beaux Arts-Trio, New York Pro Musica Antiqua und das Kroll-Quartett gesichert.

Was wir im Gegensatz zu Ellenville missten, war das Ballet oder eine Grosstat wie die Auffuehrung von Richard Strauss' "Electra". Die Opernschule in Tangelwood verdient sich ihre Sporen mit Auffuehrungen einiger z.T. unbekannter Werke (unter Boris Goldowsky), die jedoch meist ohne Auswirkung auf das Musikleben in Amerika bleiben werden.

Nach einem dieser wundervollen Konzerte wandere ich durch das idyllische Lenox. Dort auf dem Friedhof fand ich das Grab Serge Koussevitzky's, dem grossen Dirigenten und spiritus rector von Tangelwood. Zu Fuessen des Grabes, eine einfache Platte: "Unserem Freunde und Foerderer in tiefer Dankbarket vom Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra". Es war wie ein Stueck Heimat hier in Tangelwood, dem Center fuer alles, was Musik erlebenswert macht. .. Felix Bing

Summer Music Season

Leonard Bernstein, that gifted missionary, will be conductor and soloist Monday, June 22, as New York's Lewisohn Stadium concert series enters its 42nd year. Along with the Boston Pops series, the Lewisohn concerts might be said to have established the main line of summer music-making.

Perhaps on the theory that summer listening like summer eating demands simple fare, programming tends to avoid the bulkier standard offerings. Semi and light classics are staples, and there is often more of Hollywood, Broadway and Tin Pan Alley than of the traditional Three B's.

Concerts given at Ravinia Park near Chicago, at Robin Hood Dell in Philadelphia, at the Watergate in Washington, at Red Rocks outside Denver, at the Bowl near Hollywood are all more or less of this type. Besides attracting huge audiences in their own right, these summer pops programs have generally been credited with preparing a wider public for the weightier sonorities of the winter season.

Oddly enough, a radically different approach also flowers in the summer's heat. Vacation music festivals, of which the 23-year-old Tanglewood Festival at Lennox, Mass., is the best known, aren't afraid of the heaviest stuff. In fact, arcane and estoteric works far outnumber the standards.

For example, this year's Caramoor festival at Katoonah, N.Y., (June 20-July 5) will feautre 15th and 16th Century English and Flemish outdoor music by the Pro Musica Motet. Winston-Salem, N.C., is offering (June 22-28) a festival and seminar devoted exclusively to early American music. Marlboro, Vt., specializes in chamber music. Carmel, Calif., in the lesser-known works of J. S. Bach. Aspen, Colo., which lured Albert Schweitzer to its Goethe bi-centennial in 1949, is attracting more and more listeners each season despite an out-of-the-way location and the frequent abstruseness of its programs.

Summer For Art

Summer has tended more each year to become the season for art, both amateur and professional, and in all branches of the creative arts: music, drama, painting and drawing, writing.

Music tops the rest, retaining its lead each returning summer. In token of this, Leonard Bernstein, that gifted missionary, will be conductor and soloist this evening, as New York's Lewisohn Stadium concert series enters its 42nd year. Along with the Boston Pops series, the Lewisohn concerts may be said to have established the main line of summer music projects.

Nor is the fare always light or semiclassical. Though earlier ventures, like the Robin Hood Dell concerts near Philadelphia, the Watergate in Washington, the Red Rocks outside Denver and the Hollywood Bowl, began by avoiding the weightier standard works of instrumental music, more and more of them now present programs comparable to those to be heard in the winter season in the cities.

The 23-year-old Tanglewood Festival at Lenox, Mass., has always stressed the great masters, together with meritorious works of modern composers, and the encouragement given to students of conducting has been notable.

Chicago's Ravinia Park programs, well known in this area, have brought to the midwest the same artists, both soloists and conductors, who appear in winter concerts in Chicago. The Ravinia venture, always in need of support and requiring periodic revivals, has now its own adequate festival hall, replacing the airy pavilion which burned down some years ago, and is still remembered regretfully by many as identified with the golden age of Ravinia.

In addition to these old reliables, there are scores of new undertakings, and others not so new but less known. Such are the Caramoor festival at Katomah, N.Y., June 20-July 5, that at Winston-Salem, N.C., next week, Marlboro, Vt., Carmel, Calif., Aspen, Colo., and many others.

In drama summer theaters have mushroomed, and buyers need to be as selective as they are with all mushrooms. The headliners in Shakespeare continue to be the Canadian Shakespearian Festival at Stratford, Ontario, and the American one at Stratford, Conn. The free summer Shakespeare in Central Park is a thing of the past.

Writing camps, especially in rustic or scenic surroundings, tending to offer privacy and quiet, exist, in the east, and art schools, usually commercially promoted and usually good, are also available. All in all, seekers for art in summer will surely find it, if not as creative artists, at least as patrons.

MÚSICA

Berkshire Festival 1959

PRIMEIRO CONCÊRTO

Eleazar de Carvalho

(Especial para o "Diário de Notícias")

ACABA de ser inaugurada a 22ª Temporada dos Festivais de Berkshire, aqui em Tanglewood, o pitoresco recanto da cidade de Lenox, no Estado de Massachusetts, considerada a cidade da música.

Coube a Charles Munch — regente permanente e diretor artístico da Orquestra Sinfônica de Boston — inaugurar o Festival com um concêrto dedicado a Bach, como, aliás, foram os três concertos do fim da semana, isto é, sexta, sábado e domingo.

Embora o autor já esteja morto há 209 anos, sua música permanece viva, e uma multidão de cinco mil pessoas veio até aqui ouvir a coleção de 15 obras, distribuídas em 3 concertos consecutivos, o que prova o interêsse que ainda despertam suas composições.

O primeiro concêrto foi iniciado com o "Concêrto Brandemburguense", nº 3, para orquestra de arcos. Esta obra faz parte do grupo dos 6 concertos Brandemburguenses, escritos para diferentes instrumentos. Apenas êste 3º concêrto e o 6º foram escritos sòmente para instrumentos de arcos, e o 3º — com o qual Munch abriu o programa — é o único escrito sem a habitual parte lenta, que é colocada entre as duas partes rápidas. Seguiu-se a "Suite nº 2", em Si menor, para flauta e orquestra de arcos, tendo como solista o excelente flautista, Doriot Dwyer. O próprio Bach intitulou de Suite, Partita e Ouverture os diferentes grupos de danças, executados durante os concertos, hábito introduzido na Alemanha por George Muffat, e que, êle, Bach, também adotou, como está claro, inspirando-se nas "Ouvertures" francesas de Lully, no compor êsse grupo de Suites, Partitas ou Ouvertures.

A segunda parte do concêrto constou da "Oferenda Musical", e da "Contata nº 50".

Uma larga história envolve a "Oferenda Musical". A versão apresentada nesse concêrto de inauguração é de autoria de Hans Theodore David, pois a obra, que é eminentemente teórica, traz, apenas, indicações ocasionais de alguns instrumentos específicos. Conta-se que quando Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach estava a serviço de Frederico, o Grande — rei da Prússia, comentava, com justificada admiração, as qualidades de seu pai como improvisador de Fugas. E, numa noite, três anos antes de sua morte, aos 11 de maio de 1747, Bach foi recebido pelo rei que o convidou para improvisar, em estilo fugato, um tema que o próprio rei havia escrito. A execução foi tão extraordinàriamente artística, e o poder de criação do grande gênio foi tão perfeitamente concebido, que, num espaço de menos de 2 meses, isto é, no dia 7 de julho dêsse mesmo ano, Bach enviava ao rei a sua "Oferenda", com uma dedicatória, onde se podia ler a palavra "Ricercar" (significa "investigar", e foi um dos primeiros têrmos a indicar uma obra em estilo fugato), formada pelas iniciais de cada palavra seguinte: Regis Iussu Cantio Et Reliqua Canonica Arte Resolula, cuja tradução, segundo o musicólogo Mr. John Burk, é: "At the king's Command, the Song and the Remainder Resolved with Canonic Art".

A obra é composta de 13 partes, divididas em 2 "Ricercari", 9 "Canones", uma "Fuga Canônica" e uma "Sonata", tôdas elas baseadas no tema real de Frederico, O Grande.

O violinista Richard Burgin, o violoncelista Samuel Mayes, a flautista Doriot Anthony Dwyer, e o pianista Bernard Zighera, foram os solistas da 12ª parte, que é intitulada "Sonata".

Para encerrar o programa, o dr. Hugh Ross preparou a "Cantata nº 50", para côro duplo e orquestra. Os participantes do coral são os estudantes do "Berkshire Music Center". E para se ter uma idéia do preparo da mocidade norte-americana, e da competência do diretor do conjunto, basta saber-se que a cerimônia de abertura dos cursos foi no domingo, dia 28 de junho; o primeiro ensaio realizou-se na segunda-feira, dia 29; o ensaio com orquestra, na quinta-feira, dia 2 de julho, quando a obra já estava pronta, e o concêrto já sendo realizado na sexta-feira, dia 3 de julho. Portanto, com 4 dias, isto é, 4 ensaios, apenas, se considerarmos que seus componentes nem se conheciam, muitos dêles nem falam o idioma local, e estavam se encontrando pela primeira vez, quatro dias antes do concêrto, cuja execução foi das melhores.

O pequeno Teatro da Ópera estava superlotado. Fora do recinto, umas 4 mil pessoas ouviam, ao ar livre, as harmonias de Bach, vendo as estrêlas, sentindo a brisa suave e fresca das montanhas, e sabendo que viajaram 4 ou 5 horas para receberem aquêle alimento espiritual. Os demais acontecimentos da semana serão relatados na próxima vez.

Starlight Festival Begins Concert Series Tuesday

By GORDON E. ARMSTRONG

The Starlight Festival of Chamber Music will begin its fifth annual series of concerts on Tuesday evening under much more favorable and auspicious circumstances than heretofore. The threat of rain, the bane of all outdoor programs, will be eliminated in the new locale of the series which is the Courtyard of Saybrook College. In the event of rain, the concerts will be given indoors with no postponements involved. Also, the acoustics of the Courtyard are so excellent that the usual concert shell may not have to be installed.

As announced here last Sunday, there is also to be one change in the regular quartet of festival players this season. Cellist Frank Levy, a member of the celebrated Little Orchestra Society of New York, will replace Nathan Stutch who plans to stay with the New York Philharmonic this summer and go abroad with the orchestra in August. Julius Scheir, director and founder of the Starlight series, will be back this season as will violinist Ann Barak and violist Meyer Katz.

BETHANY BEARDSLEE

Two highly capable performers, both of whom have appeared in previous series, are to have guest roles in the opening concert on Tuesday evening at 8:30. They are Bethany Beardslee, soprano, and Roberts Helps, pianist, who will act as the singer's accompanist. Her offerings list two songs by Helps, Schumann's "Liederkreis," and a work by her husband, Godfrey Winham. The songs by the young pianist-composer, written in 1950, are musical settings of texts from Herman Melville's novel, "Mardi." They have since been performed both in this country and abroad. The festival quartet will accompany the singer in her husband's piece entitled, "The Habit of Perfection."

Miss Beardslee, who made a highly favorable impression in her appearance here three years ago, is returning after one of her busiest concert seasons. In addition to her regular engagements as a member of the N.Y. Pro Musica, she appeared in many lieder concerts and recently had a featured role in New York's Handel Festival. In a Town Hall concert in January, Miss Beardslee participated in two American premieres. These were Alban Berg's Altenburg Songs and Stravinsky's "Threni," the latter performance under the baton of Robert Croft. The singer's lovely voice may be heard in the recording of the latter made for Columbia Records last season under the direction of Stravinsky himself. The soprano's schedule this summer includes engagements with the Boston Symphony at the Berkshire Music Festival and at the Canada Music Festival in Saskatchewan.

The offerings of the string ensemble on Tuesday evening are to be Gabrieli's three four-part Ricercari and Beethoven's Quartet in F, Op. 135.

There are to be the usual four concerts in the present series with the later events scheduled for July 14 and 28, and August 11. Incidentally, the Saybrook College Courtyard is located at the corner of York and Elm Streets.

NORFOLK MUSIC SCHOOL PROGRAM

The second program in the Norfolk Music School series, to be given in the Music Shed at Norfolk on Wednesday afternoon at 3:30, will be a recital by the brilliant young Brazilian-born cellist, Aldo Parisot. His program is as follows: Larghetto — Nardini; Suite No. 1 in G major — Bach; Sonata in A major (Op. 69, No. 3) — Beethoven; Variations on a Rococo Theme — Tchaikovsky; Gavotta (arr. Parisot) — Albeniz. Lester Taylor will be the accompanist.

Patrons of the New Haven Symphony will remember Parisot who was the orchestra's principal cellist for a brief spell while he was taking advanced studies at the Yale Music School a decade ago. Later he appeared as guest artist with the orchestra. Parisot made his American concert debut at the Berkshire Music Festival in 1947 and in the short space of the intervening 12 years he has won recognition as one of the world's leading young cellists. To date he has appeared with major orchestras both here and abroad, including some nine solo appearances with the New York Philharmonic.

The accomplished cellist accepted a faculty post at the Norfolk Music School this summer after returning from a successful European tour. Listeners in Wednesday's recital will hear Parisot's Stradivarius cello, dated 1730, and reputed to be the last made by the celebrated maker of stringed instruments.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL TO START

The Berkshire Music Festival also gets under way this week with the opening group of three concerts scheduled for Friday and Saturday evenings, and next Sunday afternoon. Charles Munch will conduct all three concerts which are to be devoted entirely to music of Bach. The evening programs commence at 8:30 and Sunday afternoon's event is listed for 2:30.

Here are the complete programs:

Tanglewood Lectures Open To Friends

TANGLEWOOD — Friends of the Berkshire Music Center are invited to attend two series of lectures at Tanglewood during the current session of the school. The lectures will be presented on Wednesday and Friday afternoons at 3:15 in the Chamber Music Hall.

The opening lecture in the Wednesday series was given today by Ralph Berkowitz, dean of the Berkshire Music Center, who spoke on "The Tanglewood Idea."

The Friday afternoon series, entitled "A Seminar in Contemporary Music," will be devoted to talks by noted composers. Each lecture will be followed by a musical program performed by Fromm Fellowship Players — a group of young professional musicians attending the Berkshire Music Center for special work and study in contemporary music. The lecture this Friday afternoon will be given by Leon Kirchner, a member of the composition faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, who will speak on "Materials of Musical Composition."

Mr. Kirchner was born in Brooklyn and grew up in Los Angeles, Calif. Kroll Quartet Launches 1959 Berkshire Festival

By WILLARD CLARK

TANGLEWOOD — The 1959 Berkshire Festival opened Wednesday night with a concert by the Kroll String Quartet.

Old Home Day

It is always pleasant to return to Tanglewood and meet friends from many parts of the country. Opening night takes on all the characteristics of an old home week. Tanglewood is exceptionally lovely now.

Its vast grounds are clean and plush and its tall trees nod gracefully to those who walk beneath them.

The Kroll String Quartet not only opened the festival but inaugurated series of a chamber music concerts to be held Wednesday night during the festival.

These concerts have become increasingly important and draw by far the most distinguished audiences. Tonight the theater was not crowded, due probably to the very cool weather. While the Kroll String Quartet has held a highly respected place among such groups, it is not the most exciting foursome to be had and its fame is due in great measure to Dr. Kroll, whose musicianship and scholarship are formidable.

The concert opened with a rather pallid performance of Beethoven's string quartet in Major op 18 No. 2. The Opus 18 quartets have an almost dual personality. On one side you have the familiar forms established by Mozart and Haydn, while on the other you have the sudden eruptions and harmonic changes which were to mark the later quartets. It all makes for a fascinating listening experience.

1930 Composition

Prokofieff's first string quartet was written in 1930, the second appeared in 1941. This first quartet is lyrical in character with the first violin carrying much of the melodic line. There are to be found few traces of the frenetic early Prokofieff, yet there is unalloyed spice in the harmonic intervals. The work was played with a deal of animation and the performance was well integrated. Dr. Kroll's artistry shone brilliantly.

The final quartet was the Dvorak "String quartet in E flat major, Op. 51." It dates from 1879 and was the composer's fifth published work in this form, although many more were to follow. This is a quartet built of Czechish themes, flowing and harmonic in character. Its melodies are lovely and the players made the most of them.

The Bach-Mozart series begins Friday night when Charles Munch will direct performances of Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto No. 5," "Suite No. 2" featuring flutist Doriot A. Dwyer; the "Musical Offering" and Cantata No. 50 featuring the Tanglewood choir.

Saturday night Dr. Munch will offer the Bach concertos for 1, 2 and 3 pianos. The soloists will be Lukas Foss, Bernard Zighera and Ralph Berkowitz. The Sunday afternoon concert will offer the Brandenburg concerto No. 6, the cantata No. 51 featuring Bethay Beardslee, soprano, and the violin and oboe concerto, featuring Posselt and Gomberg.

Music Review

The Kroll String Quartet

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

TWENTY-FIVE SUMMERS ago, in August of 1934, it is very doubtful if the founders of the Berkshire Festival could have hoped, even less foreseen, that their pioneering venture would expand and encompass so many allied branches of music in addition to the purely orchestral programs on which they initially concentrated.

Last night at Tanglewood in the Theater-concert hall a program by the Kroll String Quartet opened the 25th season of Berkshire Festivals. (There were no concerts scheduled in 1943.) No chamber music organization has appeared at Tanglewood so often as the Krolls, and, consequently, no one else has exhibited such a wide selection of both the most beloved and, as well, the less familiar works of the masters in their field.

LAST NIGHT'S program was a prime example of their scope and catholic comprehension for after the second of the Beethoven Op. 18s, they played the Prokokieff First Quartet and the Dvorak Op. 51, in E flat. They gave the Beethoven, known in Germany as the "Compliment Quartet" because its opening phrases are supposed to represent the polite greetings between cultured persons in the 18th century, their own cachet. They took a remarkably relaxed tempo, slower and more leisurely than is commonly accepted, yet one that gave it a deep character, and, on reflection, one than stands inspection much better than a swift, thoughtless one.

PROKOFIEFF wrote his first quartet in 1930 on a commission from the late Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge of this city, in the same year he wrote his Fourth Symphony for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The extraordinary gifted Russian wrote with a facility that never left him speechless even if it did leave him at times without a message. This is an exhilarating work, full of contrasts, but sometimes deliberately artless and a bit brazenly harsh. The Krolls worked hard to invest it with moods of majesty and tenderness, particularly in the last movement, but their special attribute of elegance did not lend itself to the work as much, we felt, as a less polished ensemble might have accomplished with a thicker, more gross approach.

DEAR OLD Dvorak, except for the chamber music and the symphony he wrote here in the early 1890s, when he was teaching in this country, is nearly neglected. And so it was a great boon, first, to hear at all his lovable E Flat Quartet, and then to hear it with such true affection as the Krolls gave it last night. This is full of charm and simplicity, full of fresh melodic ideas and wonderfully colored harmony and elemental rhythms, and the Krolls made it glow. It exudes Bohemian folk spirit in the more spirited movements as well as in the Dumka and the Romanza, and its heartfelt communication was thoroughly sensed.

It was Dvorak who first introduced the term 'Dumka" to music, usurping it from literature where it had been applied to a sort of lament. We may possibly have derived out term "in the dumps" from it, as a dump was at one time a melancholy tune although Shakespeare paradoxically asked for " a merry dump." The Krolls gave it poignacy, and the dialogue between the violin and the viola was a conspicuous moment of tonal beauty.

THE MEMBERS of the quartet are William Kroll and Louis Graeler, violins; David Manovitz, viola, and Avron Twerdowsky, cello. There is no more authoritative chamber music playing on the concert plafform today. The distinction they can give to such a familiar and well-worn masterpece as their Beethovan last night is a revelation of what consistant study and polishing can make of such precious and indestructible material.

After many recalls, they graciously added the adagio from the Haydn Quartet Op. 64, No. 5.

The Berkshire Music Center was established in 1940 as a realization of a project envisioned by Serge Koussevitsky, the Symphony's late conductor. Charles Munch is the director of the Center and Aaron Copland, prominant American composer, serves as Chairman of the Faculty. The school comprises four main departments; instrumental, choral, composition, and the Tanglewood study Group, primarily for the amateur, teacher, or music enthusiast.

Other programs are offered during the week at Tanglewood. Thoughout the season, each Wednesday, there are Chamber Music Concerts. The Fromm Foundation offers two mid-week concerts, the Tanglewood Choir performs twice during the season, the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra plays each Thursday night in the Shed, and the Boston Pops Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler puts on a performance Thursday, August 6, entitled Tanglewood on Parade.

On the weekends featuring the works of Tchaikovsky, Brahms and Mendelsshon, the works of other leading composers will be heard. Included will be selections from Berioz, Rimskykorsakov, Debussy, Piston, Copland and Wagner.

Tanglewood Festival Starts; Features Boston Symphony

By IRENE JARRY

News Music Columnist

The Tanglewood Berkshire Festival at Lenox got under way yesterday and is to run through Aug. 9 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Taking place nearby at the Berkshire Music Barn are the Jazz and Folk Song concerts. They started June 28 and will continue to Sept. 6.

Musically, for music enthusiasts, students and professionals alike, Tanglewood has one of the most glamorous settings. Besides having the best and most varied music America can offer, the country is especially beautiful. The acres of Tanglewood, with its beautiful lawns, gardens, great trees, and lake shore is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is there also that the principals of the Boston Orchestra, together with other members of a distinguished faculty, some of the best composers of America and Europe, hold the annual session of the Berkshire Music Center, a school for "living and working in music."

New composers and compositions are born here. They have a large choral group, forums, chamber music, opera, and every other type of musical activity. It is the final roster for talent. One encounters artists, actors, writers, and personalities. It is fast becoming to the American people what the famous European festivals have meant. You can walk around the grounds before a concert, visit the school and music store with its many unusual scores, and brush up against men like Milhaud, Copland and Bernstein, who are either visiting or teaching.

Tanglewood also has a literary and a historical meaning. It was the meeting place of Emerson, Holmes, Melville and Hawthorne. Hawthorne lived here in 1850. It was here that he first imagined his "Tanglewood Tales", which he told to his children. He also wrote "The House of Seven Gables" here. The "Little Red House" in which he lived and worked has been rebuilt in replica. If you are taking the children for a Sunday afternoon concert, plan to go early to visit the historical places.

For people interested in jazz; concerts held from today through Sunday evening at Freebody Park, Newport, R. I., will highlight jazz in every form from Dixieland to "progressive." There will be four evening performances, three afternoon concerts, three morning symposiums, and the premiere of a jazz ballet.

The Newport Folk Festival will be held Saturday evening, July 11, and Sunday afternoon and evening, July 12, also at Freebody Park.

The Castle Hill Concerts at Ipswich will begin tomorrow and run through Aug. 22 with chamber music, jazz, and dance programs.

Happy listening!

Mrs. Elmo F. Benedetto of Lynn and Mrs. Leonard J. Clark of Peabody are co-chairmen for the Supper Dance which will begin with a cocktail hour around the Olympic pool. A buffet supper will be served under the tent and dancing will be to the music of Harry Marshard's orchestra.

Tanglewood Festival Starts; Features Boston Symphony

By IRENE JARRY

News Music Columnist

The Tanglewood Berkshire Festival at Lenox got under way yesterday and is to run through Aug. 9 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Taking place nearby at the Berkshire Music Barn are the Jazz and Folk Song concerts. They started June 28 and will continue to Sept. 6.

Musically, for music enthusiasts, students and professionals alike, Tanglewood has one of the most glamorous settings. Besides having the best and most varied music America can offer, the country is especially beautiful. The acres of Tanglewood, with its beautiful lawns, gardens, great trees, and lake shore is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is there also that the principals of the Boston Orchestra, together with other members of a distinguished faculty, some of the best composers of America and Europe, hold the annual session of the Berkshire Music Center, a school for "living and working in music."

New composers and compositions are born here. They have a large choral group, forums, chamber music, opera, and every other type of musical activity. It is the final roster for talent. One encounters artists, actors, writers, and personalities. It is fast becoming to the American people what the famous European festivals have meant. You can walk around the grounds before a concert, visit the school and music store with its many unusual scores, and brush up against men like Milhaud, Copland and Bernstein, who are either visiting or teaching.

Tanglewood also has a literary and a historical meaning. It was the meeting place of Emerson, Holmes, Melville and Hawthorne. Hawthorne lived here in 1850. It was here that he first imagined his "Tanglewood Tales," which he told to his children. He also wrote "The House of Seven Gables" here. The "Little Red House" in which he lived and worked has been rebuilt in replica. If you are taking the children for a Sunday afternoon concert, plan to go early to visit the historical places.

For people interested in jazz; concerts held from today through Sunday evening at Freebody Park, Newport, R. I., will highlight jazz in every form from Dixieland to "progressive." There will be four evening performances, three afternoon concerts, three morning symposiums, and the premiere of a jazz ballet.

The Newport Folk Festival will be held Saturday evening, July 11, and Sunday afternoon and evening, July 12, also at Freebody Park.

The Castle Hill Concerts at Ipswich will begin tomorrow and run through Aug. 22 with chamber music, jazz, and dance programs.

Happy listening!

Music Will Attract Many NE Tourists

Symphony, Jazz Vie At Lenox, Newport & Hub

Highlighting the contribution of music festivals to our recreational industries, New England resort operators are preparing for an influx of tourists and music devotees who are expected to attend a varied series of concerts in the New England area this summer. The concept of a music festival which started with the Tanglewood Concert Series has now mushroomed to include not only the devotees of classical music but also those of jazz. Along with this unique development has been a growing awareness by hotelmen and restaurateurs of the promotional possibilities implicit in these festivals.

Tanglewood Opens

The 22nd Music Festival at Tanglewood, annually attracting crowds of more than 30,000, opens July 4th weekend. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Charles Munch will present a series of Bach concerts on the first weekend commencing with the Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 3 and [illegible]. The Festival, which will extend through August 9th, will feature on successive weekends the works of Mozart, Tchaikovsky, Brahms, Berlioz, Mendelssohn and Beethoven.

Provides Tourist Service

Running concurrently but for a somewhat more extended period of time will be the annual jazz concerts and seminars presented at the Berkshire Music Barn at Music Inn in Lenox. Featuring such jazz musicians as Dizzy Gillespie, Duke Ellington, the Modern Jazz Quartet and Dave Brubeck along with folksong artists Richard Dyer-Bennet and Pete Seeger, this festival is scheduled to continue through Labor Day.

Important in the development of the total potentialities of these two concert series has been the formation of the Berkshire Hills Conference. Providing information and reservation services for tourists, this association of resort operators represents a growing realization of the need for joint efforts in promoting the recreational possibilities of specific areas.

The Newport Jazz Festival, which annually attracts thousands of visitors to this Rhode Island vacation spot, has already begun. The Count Basie Band was featured at the opening concert on Thursday evening, July 2nd. The series continues through Sunday, July 5th and features such artists as Buck Clayton, Ahmad Jamal, George Shearing and Gene Krupa.

First Boston Festival

Meanwhile, plans for the first Boston Jazz Festival which is being co-sponsored by Sheraton Hotels and George Wein are continuing to jell as hotel operators in the Boston area prepare for expected tourists and jazz devotees. The Boston Festival which will be at Fenway Park August 21-23 is one of three which Sheraton and Wein will stage this summer; the others being at Toronto, Ontario and French Lick, Indiana. On the opposite side of town, Arthur Fiedler has already begun the 31st Esplanade Concert Series at the Hatch Memorial Shell on Storrow Drive. Now one of the annual musical attractions for tourists and visitors to Boston, the concerts will be given through July 10th with the exception of July 4th and will be resumed for another one week period, August 10-15.

FIRST IN BACH SERIES DRAWS LARGE CROWD

Performance at Tanglewood Is Rare Evening Of Relaxation

By WILLARD M. CLARK

TANGLEWOOD—The famous series of concerts devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart, which were initiated by the late Serge Koussevitzky, have grown in popularity so much that it is virtually impossible to obtain seats for them.

Many Seated Outside

The first concert, devoted to the music of Bach, was presented Friday night in the theather before a capacity audience along with the hundred of others seated on the grounds, the weather being ideal. We are told the audience numbered 3283.

Charles Munch and his instrumentalists appear to enjoy these rather intimate performances as much as the audience and the result is an evening of rare listening relaxation, with the listener pretty well assured that all will go well.

The concert opened with a finely detailed performance of the Brandenburg concerto No. 3 in G major for string orchestra. The concerto is unique among the six in that there is no intervening slow movement to bring the customary contrast between the two allegros. The result is the impression of strength and buoyancy and joy. Mr. Munch was in fine form and the skilled players gave of their best.

No Bach cycle would be complete without at least one of the suites for flute and string orchestra, with Doriot A. Dwyer, the flutist. Dr. Munch chose this year to play the suite No. 2 in B minor.

Technique Faultless

Mrs. Dwyer's technique is faultless and her musicality impeccable. Each movement became a dramatic entity and the final badinerie was a personal triumph for Mrs. Dwyer who was called back at least a half-dozen times. Dr. Munch has been known to allow a repeat of the final movement but permission was not forthcoming this time. The audience went into intermission in a joyous mood.

Bach's "Musical Offering" is a joy and challenge to both the student of composition and the listeper. Its 13 contrapuntual numbers upon a theme provided by Frederick the Great explore and originate forms so intricate and exquisite that one is left bewildered by the very abundance.

It takes a great group of players to give these movements their just due. Dr. Munch eliminated a very small portion of the entire work and his intensity and obvious dedication to the music kept the audience enthralled, which also goes to prove the seriousness and musicality of the particular listeners who make up the audiences for these Bach-Mozart concerts.

Chorus Participates

The final work on the program introduced the festival chorus which is directed by Hugh Ross, in a performance of Cantata No. 50, a single movement cantata calling for double chorus and an orchestra with trumpets and timpani. The text is taken from St. John XII, 10-12 and is titled "Nun ist das heil und die kraft."

The cantata is a fragment, it would not fit into any service. It is a fugal chorus divided into two parts of equal length, the second having entirely new contrapuntal and modulatory treatment. It is monumental work, at time ponderous and it was made a bit more so by the slow tempo at which it was taken.

The Festival Chorus will sound better as the festival continues, but its utterance of the cantata presages well for the future.

Tonight, in the shed, the program will be devoted to piano concertos of Bach for one, and three pianos and Suite No. 4 for orchestra. Lukas Foss, Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera will be the pianists.

Bach Program Opens Tanglewood Season

By HOSS PARMENTER
Special to The New York Times.

LENOX, Mass., July 3—The twenty-second Berkshire Festival opened at Tanglewood tonight. Following a tradition established during World War II, it began with Bach.

There was an audience of 3,283, consisting of the 1,200 persons who filled every seat in the Theatre-Concert Hall, and the remainder who sat out on the lawn.

The clear beauty of the cool night undoubtedly played a role in attracting so large an audience. But the attendance was also an index of the festival's growth. Last year, for instance, it drew 168,773, and this year's advance sale gives promise of a new record.

At that, the audience was small compared with those that attend when the concerts are in the 6,000-seat Shed. And the relative intimacy of the occasion was one of the charms of the evening. These listeners were nearly all Bach devotees, and the understanding way in which they listened helped the music to create its particular spell.

Most of them will undoubtedly be back tomorrow night and Sunday afternoon, for those programs will be all-Bach, too. Like this evening's concert, they will be led by Charles Munch with the orchestra consisting of about half of the Boston Symphony.

The opening program consisted of the Third Brandenburg Concerto, the Second Suite, almost all of the "Musical Offering" and the short fugal chorus known as Cantata No. 5, "Nun Ist das Heil und die Kraft." The chorus for the last-named was made up of forty-five of the 300 students who are attending this summer's session of the Berkshire Music Center.

The Third Brandenburg consists of two Allegros, and Mr. Munch took them both rather deliberately. The playing of the strings, too, was inclined to be heavy and a little thick. But there was a vigorous, four-square quality to the interpretation, which contrasted pleasantly with the delicacy of texture of the suite that followed.

Doriot Anthony Dwyer, first flutist of the Boston Symphony, was the soloist in the suite. Her playing was deft and agile, being especially full-toned and graceful in the Minuet. The audience recalled her many times to acknowledge its applause.

The "Musical Offering" and the Cantata proved oddly assorted. The former is so searching and intimate in the exploration of its musical materials; the latter a work of massive sonorities. Both, however, brought forward new facets of Bach's genius.

For this, one was grateful, even though one had reservations about the use of the piano in the "Offering," and the young choristers obviously needed more rehearsing for the Cantata than they had been able to receive in the five days the center has been in session.

PIANO CONCERTOS of Bach for one, two and three pianos will be featured on the program for Saturday evening, July 4, in the Music Shed, conducted by Charles Munch. Soloists will include Lukas Foss, noted composer and conductor as well as pianist, Bernard Zighera, pianist and principal harpist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Ralph Berkowitz, manager of the Albuquerque Symphony Orchestra. FIRST IN BACH SERIES DRAWS LARGE CROWD

By WILLARD M. CLARK

TANGLEWOOD—The famous series of concerts devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart, which were initiated by the late Serge Koussevitzky, have grown in popularity so much that it is virtually impossible to obtain seats for them.

Many Seated Outside

The first concert, devoted to the music of Bach, was presented Friday night in the theather before a capacity audience along with the hundred of others seated on the grounds, the weather being ideal. We are told the audience numbered 3283.

Charles Munch and his instrumentalists appear to enjoy these rather intimate performances as much as the audience and the result is an evening of rare listening relaxation, with the listener pretty well assured that all will go well.

The concert opened with a finely detailed performance of the Brandenburg concerto No. 3 in G major for string orchestra. The concerto is unique among the six in that there is no intervening slow movement to bring the customary contrast between the two allegros. The result is the impression of strength and buoyancy and joy. Mr. Munch was in fine form and the skilled players gave of their best.

No Bach cycle would be complete without at least one of the suites for flute and string orchestra, with Doriot A. Dwyer, the flutist. Dr. Munch chose this year to play the suite No. 2 in B minor.

Technique Faultless

Mrs. Dwyer's technique is faultless and her musicality impeccable. Each movement became a dramatic entity and the final badinerie was a personal triumph for Mrs. Dwyer who was called back at least a half-dozen times. Dr. Munch has been known to allow a repeat of the final movement but permission was not forthcoming this time. The audience went into intermission in a joyous mood.

Bach's "Musical Offering" is a joy and challenge to both the student of composition and the listener. Its 13 contrapuntual numbers upon a theme provided by Frederick the Great explore and originate forms so intricate and exquisite that one is left bewildered by the very abundance.

It takes a great group of players to give these movements their just due. Dr. Munch eliminated a very small portion of the entire work and his intensity and obvious dedication to the music kept the audience enthralled, which also goes to prove the seriousness and musicality of the particular listeners who make up the audiences for these Bach-Mozart concerts.

Chorus Participates

The final work on the program introduced the festival chorus which is directed by Hugh Ross, in a performance of Cantata No. 50, a single movement cantata calling for double chorus and an orchestra with trumpets and timpani. The text is taken from St. John XII, 10-12 and is titled "Nun ist das heil und die kraft."

The cantata is a fragment, it would not fit into any service. It is a fugal chorus divided into two parts of equal length, the second having entirely new contrapuntal and modulatory treatment. It is monumental work, at time ponderous and it was made a bit more so by the slow tempo at which it was taken.

The Festival Chorus will sound better as the festival continues, but its utterance of the cantata presages well for the future.

Tonight, in the shed, the program will be devoted to piano concertos of Bach for one, and three pianos and Suite No. 4 for orchestra. Lukas Foss, Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera will be the pianists.

Bach Program Opens Tanglewood Season

By ROSS PARMENTER
Special to The New York Times.

LENOX, Mass., July 3—The twenty-second Berkshire Festival opened at Tanglewood tonight. Following a tradition established during World War II, it began with Bach.

There was an audience of 3,283, consisting of the 1,200 persons who filled every seat in the Theatre-Concert Hall, and the remainder who sat out on the lawn.

The clear beauty of the cool night undoubtedly played a role in attracting so large an audience. But the attendance was also an index of the festival's growth. Last year, for instance, it drew 168,773, and this year's advance sale gives promise of a new record.

At that, the audience was small compared with those that attend when the concerts are in the 6,000-seat Shed. And the relative intimacy of the occasion was one of the charms of the evening. These listeners were nearly all Bach devotees, and the understanding way in which they listened helped the music to create its particular spell.

Most of them will undoubtedly be back tomorrow night and Sunday afternoon, for those programs will be all-Bach, too. Like this evening's concert, they will be led by Charles Munch with the orchestra consisting of about half of the Boston Symphony.

The opening program consisted of the Third Brandenburg Concerto, the Second Suite, almost all of the "Musical Offering" and the short fugal chorus known as Cantata No. 5, "Nun Ist das Heil und die Kraft." The chorus for the last-named was made up of forty-five of the 300 students who are attending this summer's session of the Berkshire Music Center.

The Third Brandenburg consists of two Allegros, and Mr. Munch took them both rather deliberately. The playing of the strings, too, was inclined to be heavy and a little thick. But there was a vigorous, four-square quality to the interpretation, which contrasted pleasantly with the delicacy of texture of the suite that followed.

Doriot Anthony Dwyer, first flutist of the Boston Symphony, was the soloist in the suite. Her playing was deft and agile, being especially full-toned and graceful in the Minuet. The audience recalled her many times to acknowledge its applause.

The "Musical Offering" and the Cantata proved oddly assorted. The former is so searching and intimate in the exploration of its musical materials; the latter a work of massive sonorities. Both, however, brought forward new facets of Bach's genius.

For this, one was grateful, even though one had reservations about the use of the piano in the "Offering," and the young choristers obviously needed more rehearsing for the Cantata than they had been able to receive in the five days the center has been in session.

Boston Symphony Opens Festival at Tanglewood

By Francis D. Perkins

LENOX, Mass., July 4.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra began this summer's first Berkshire Festival week end at Tnglewood last night when an audience of 3,283 listened to music by Johann Sebastian Bach conducted by Charles Munch. Eleven hundred listeners occupied all seats of the Theater-Concert Hall; the others sat outside during weather that was everything that a festival management could pray for.

Between thirty and fifty of the Boston Symphony's musicians play in the first two week ends of the Festival.' The full orchestra will be heard during the remainder of this six-week series.

3d Brandenburg Concerto

Mr. Munch began his program with the third Brandenburg Concerto for Strings, and the Suite No. 2 in B Minor with Doriot Anthony Dwyer, the orchestra's first flautist, as soloist. The "Musical Offering" followed, and the cantata, "Nun Ist Das Heil" gave the evening a triumphant close.

Both the Concerto and the Suite are familiar to New York concert-goers. The "Musical Offering" is less often played in public and, although it is a remarkable example of Bach's constructive mastery, it is a little hard to take, even in yesterday's abridged performance of thirty-five minutes.

Some of its episodes are distinctly treasurable, but at times the music suggests an imposing theoretical exercise. The orchestra was in good form; the solo roles admirably played and the opening section, in particular, had an eloquent interpretation, but still this music gave a certain sense of length.

Pace Unusually Deliberate

Mr. Munch took the first movement of the Brandenburg Concerto at an unusually deliberate pace, which lessened the music's essential spirit and momentum, although the lucid sonority of the Bostonian strings was rewarding.

Mrs. Dwyer's delectable solo playing in the Second Suite has become a virtual Berkshire Festival tradition. This time it had its expected virtuosity, tonal flawlessness and interpretative musicianship, and the soloist was enthusiastically recalled several times, while the orchestral performance was admirable and sympathetic.

The forty-five members of the Festival Chorus, trained by Hugh Ross, sang in the closing cantata which occupies less than five minutes. With only a few days available for rehearsal, some lack of polish in the choral tone could be condoned. The singing was spirited and the performance conveyed the atmosphere of victory which pervades both the music and the text.

Second Thoughts on Music

Many Changes Evident In 25 Years at Tanglewood

Henry Hadley Conducted New York Philarmonic Before Charles Munch and Boston Symphony Generated Spark of Life in Berkshires

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX—Here we are again, just 25 years from the time we heard the first orchestra concert in the Berkshires. Henry Hadley conducted a group of 60 members of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra in a series of concerts on the grounds of the Hanna estate. Mr. Hadley was primarily a composer and, as they do today, he made his concerts the occasion to introduce many of his own works, even going as far as introducing his wife as soprano soloist. The concerts were not an unqualified success and Mr. Hadley resigned, ill health being given as the reason.

Exciting Events

Then came the halcycon days of Koussevitsky and the gift of Tanglewood to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Those were great days with every concert an exciting event, no matter what was played or how it was played. Koussevitsky always had the audience at his command. He generated an excitement which sometimes reached the stage of hysteria. With his death, the spark died, it has never been rekindled.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Munch has many solid musical accomplishments to its credit. It has had even greater moments during its festival concerts and has played the standard reportory as well as it has ever been played, but Charles Munch has never been in close communication with his audiences; at times he becomes so immersed in music that one feels he doesn't realize they are present. However, Tanglewood is the one place in this country where you may hear the standard repertory played by a great orchestra under ideal conditions.

Tanglewood is beautiful. Its grounds handsomely manicured and its great trees seem to whisper a welcome as the wind blows through them. The formal gardens, edged with age old box-wood, are inspiring, even though the modernistic sculpture seems oddly out of place.

The season opened Wednesday night with the first of the chamber music concerts. The Kroll String Quartet was performer. The quartet holds a respected place in its field. Its members are solid musicians and if they lack the sparkle and sheen of other ensembles, their interpretation of the music is always scholarly and musical. The quartet will be heard twice this season.

The program opened with the Beethoven "Quartet, Op. 18, No. 2" and included the Prokofieff "Quartet, Op. 50" and Devorak's "Quartet Op. 51. Mr. Kroll is always the dominating figure; it is in every way "his" quartet. These chamber music concerts draw a distinguished audience of musicians, a quite different audience than one will find at the other concerts.

Bach-Mozart Series

The Bach-Mozart series opened Friday when Charles Munch led a chamber orchestra in the Brandenburg Concerto No. 3; the Suite No. 2, featuring flutist Doriot Dwyer, a Musical Offering and the Cantata No. 50, featuring the Tanglewood Choir. Further news on this and the Saturday concert next week.

The second week of the festival opens with a Bach program today in which Charles Munch will offer the Brandenburg concerto, No. 6, Cantata No. 51 featuring soprano Bethany Beardslee and the violin and oboe concerto with Ruth Posselt and Gomberg as soloists.

The Wednesday night chamber music concert will be given by the New York Pro Musica group in a program of music by Monteverdi and the Italian Baroque composers. The concerts Friday and Saturday nights will be devoted to the music of Mozart. Mozart's "Prague" symphony and his "Requiem" will be heard Sunday at 2.30 p. m. Soloists in the Requiem will be Adele Addison, Florence Kopleff, Blake Stern and Donald Gramm, all very popular here.

Pleasant Programs For Summer Days

CONCERTS, summer theater, and art exhibitions are among the attractions which can be enjoyed this week by those looking for a few hours of interesting entertainment.

TONIGHT at 7:30 in Institute Park the first of this season's Industrial Pops Concerts will be given by the Worcester Orchestra under the direction of Harry Levenson. Open to the public without charge, the concerts are presented at the orchestra shell in the park on Salisbury Street across from Worcester Polytechnic Institute. On a pleasant summer evening one of these concerts is an enjoyable way of listening informally to varied and excellent programs, and in case of rain the program will be given Monday.

ANOTHER outdoor concert today will be given this afternoon in Green Hill Park in the series of city band concerts. Today's musicians will be the State Guard Band under the direction of Ernest Reopel, and the program will be presented from 2 to 4 p.m.

MUSIC further afield can be heard at Tanglewood in Lenox in the annual Berkshire Festival presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The weekend concert series begin this weekend with three programs in the Music Shed devoted to the works of Bach. Next weekend the programs will feature music by Mozart. Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concerts on Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon. All will be given in the huge Music Shed on the grounds of Tanglewood.

THE SECOND of this season's productions at the open-air Theater on the Green in Wellesley will begin Tuesday and continue through July 18. The play will be "A Streetcar Named Desire" by Tennessee Williams, starring Cavada Humphrey and Robert Blackburn. Performances will be given nightly at 8:30 except on Sunday evenings. The play will be presented in the outdoor amphitheater on the grounds of Wellesley College. In case of rain the performance is moved indoors to Alumnae Hall.

AT THE Worcester Art Museum visitors can see the current summer show, "The Dial — and The Dial Collection," a comprehensive showing of modern painting based on the collection begun by The Dial magazine in the 1920's. At that time the magazine was influential in introducing and encouraging many contemporary artists and authors who later became world famous. At the Craft Center a special exhibition of Scandinavian Design is on view until July 15. The objects were done by outstanding designer craftsmen from the four Scandinavian countries, and they show useful and decorative household accessories in wood, metal, ceramics, glass, and textiles.

All-Bach Program

Pianist Foss Scores at Tanglewood

Pianist Lukas Foss captivated the audience with his forceful solo playing in the weekend's Bach program at Tanglewood.

The revised Fourth of July evening program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra included Johann Sebastian Bach's two concertos for three claviers (C Major and D Minor); the concertos for glavier in F Minor and D Minor, and the Suite No. 4 in D Major.

Munch Conducts

The concert was the second of the 22d Berkshire Festival season, which opened Friday. Charles Munch conducted both nights.

Mr. Foss played forcefully but gracefully, capturing the spirit of the highly rhythmic clavier concerto in D minor and melodic F minor concerto.

Bach's ingenuity and skill in his only concertos for three claviers was conveyed to the audience by pianists Foss Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera. (An old tradition has it that the composer wrote these two pieces so that he might play them with his two sons.)

Mozart Next

An all-Mozart program next weekend follows the Bach Festival. Among the selections will be Symphonies 35, 38, 39, 40, and 41.

Charles Munch will conduct the three programs. Sunday's will include the Mozart Requiem Mass in D Minor with the Festival Chorus, directed by Hugh Ross. Adele Addison, soprano and Donald Gramm, bass, will be soloists—E. S.

In Brief . . .

It was a brilliant opening weekend at Tanglewood, with a special fillip imparted by the new stage canopy in the Music Shed. In the judgment of Dr. Munch, the engineers who designed it, and a good many music lovers, the canopy's sound-enhancing qualities are all that [illegible] hoped. . . . No mention of the weekend should go without recognition of the weather, however. When a big holiday coincides with sunny skies and pleasant temperatures (the kind of weather people leave the cities to find), one can only murmur grateful acknowledgment. . . . The clean-up by many volunteer workers of Great Barrington's Lake Mansfield beach, initiated by the Great Barrington Recreation Association, demonstrates that when a civic project is popular, helpers are not hard to find.

The extent to which Civil Defense has become a political football is alarmingly illustrated by the dispute between the state administration and legislators over cuts in the state's CD appropriation. If cuts must be made, eliminating area and sector offices while retaining a fully-staffed headquarters seems a weird way of doing it . . . Anyone who thinks it's too late to do any worthwhile planning in Berkshire County should consider the finding of Technical Planning Associates that less than three per cent of the county's acreage is built up, and 35 per cent is available for future development . . .

Berkshire Festival's 22d Season

Charles Munch Conducts Opening Bach Concerts

By Jules Wolffers

Lenox, Mass.

The skies smiled for Tanglewood's opening this year as the dry atmosphere favored the instruments and the mild temperature favored the hearers for the first weekend of concerts presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Festival.

Traditionally the opening programs have been devoted to music for chamber orchestra, and traditionally these have been presented in the intimate Theater-Concert Hall so well-suited to the nuances, delicacy of expression, and flexibility which distinguish chamber orchestra performances from the more massive projection of the full symphony orchestra.

These concerts have been and are all the more welcome to Boston hearers who are well served by the orchestra but who lack the frequent small orchestra performances which ought to be part of the musical life in any large musical center.

In these days of fast transportation and turnpikes, however, it is not difficult for Bostonians to make what has become merely a two-hour trip by automobile. One noted many musical Bostonians at Friday evening's opening program, and several of these had come down for this one concert only — something quite impractical in the old days of Route 20.

Obviously fit and hearty, Charles Munch was warmly greeted by audience and musicians for the first of the three Bach programs. But as sometimes may happen on openings, the performances served primarily for the purposes of reestablishing rapport and smoothing out the rough spots of ensemble almost inevitable when a highly trained team shifts its emphasis and style from one form of expression to another.

Thus while the over-all string tone was of good quality there was little finesse in the Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, which came close to becoming heavy-handed. And the same might be said for the evening's concluding work, the Cantata No. 50—"Nun ist das Heil"—which found the Festival Chorus not yet settled down to smoothness or effectiveness.

In between came the contrast of a triumph and a failure. Doriot Anthony Dwyer and Mr. Munch received nothing short of an ovation for their charming delineation of the Suite No. 2 in B minor for Flute and Strings. But the mixture of orchestral transcription and chamber music presented in the "Musical Offering" became neither fish nor fowl, particularly when Mr. Munch conducted a trio sonata for only four players with a firm direction that left little to the group's own initiative and intuition.

The ever-growing attendance for the chamber orchestra concerts has made it necessary to shift some of the programs to the Music Shed where Saturday evening's concert was given. After opening with a vital and enthusiastic reading of the Suite for Orchestra No. 4 in D major, Mr. Munch went on to the principal part of the evening—Bach's concertos for keyboard.

Lukas Foss was the particular star of this interesting program, with a well-proportioned performance of the F minor Concerto and a completely magnificent interpretation of the far superior Concerto in D minor No. 1, in which Mr. Munch and the orchestra collaborated for a closely knit and beautifully shaped interpretation. This was the high spot of an evening which also included the Concertos for Three Keyboards in D minor No. 1, and C major No. 2.

Here Mr. Foss was joined by Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera for some nice teamwork. But some of the tempi were open to question, particularly the extreme slowness of what should be the flowing siciliano in the second movement of the D minor. Furthermore, these concertos need the incisiveness of the harpsichord to make their point, for which the modern grand piano is no substitute.

Judging from this first program heard with the Shed's new acoustic shell, the sound is rounder and fuller. Some echo seemed to be present at times, but this can undoubtedly be corrected. The new arrangement is made up of triangular boards staggered with open space. This triangular motive is carried out on the stage for a handsome visual effect with the panels extending far over the sides and top.

Those who listen on the surrounding lawns this year may find the music even clearer than it has sounded in past years.

Series of Bach Concerts Ended At Tanglewood

By WILLARD M. CLARK

TANGLEWOOD — The first week end of concerts devoted to the works of Johann Sebastian Bach concluded Sunday afternoon with an entertaining program played for an audience of 3145 people. Total attendance for the three concerts was 11,001. In addition there were 1543 persons who attended the open rehearsal Saturday morning.

Taxing Cantata

Charles Munch opened Sunday's program with a well proportioned and searching performance of the "Brandenburg Concerto No. 6 in B flat major for strings." It was a performance highly polished and rhythmically sound.

In the tremendously taxing Cantata No. 51 (Jauchzett Gott In Allen Landen) the soloists were Bethany Beardslee, soprano, and Roger Voisin, trumpet. Miss Beardslee revealed a lovely, flexible soprano voice which she had under expert control. She has a fine trill and unusual clarity of enunciation, but the timber of the voice is not such that joyous allelujas come for in very convincing manner. Mr. Voisin was at his best, playing strongly and seemingly ignoring the ensemble at times. In a more grateful work, it would be pleasant to hear Miss Beardslee again.

Ruth Posselt, violinist and Ralph Gomberg, oboeist were the splended soloists in the "Concerto for violin and oboe in D minor." This is a lovely work filled with unusual colorations and its melodic content is as unusual. The first movement is a melodic duet with plenty of give and take. The adagio is one of great beauty, the soloists having a long duet in which the two instruments are delicately interwoven voices accompanied by softly plucked strings. In the final allegro the orchestra bursts forth in full force and the work comes to a climatic end.

Total Enjoyment

Mr. Munch concluded the concert with the "Suite No. 3 in D major." The audience reaction to the exquiste and familiar "Air" was one of total enjoyment, but it was also realized that there were many, many beautiful moments throughout the suite. Mr. Munch appeared to be in his most dedicated mood as he conducted, oblivious of everything except the music. It was a beautiful, memorable performance.

Next week end will be devoted to the music of Mozart. The usual Wednesday night chamber music concert will be given by the Pro Musica of New York. The group will be making its second visit to Tanglewood. The program will consist of works by Monteverdi and Baroque composers.

First Series of Concerts At Tanglewood Draws 11,001

With ideal summer weather throughout the weekend, the first series of concerts in the 1959 Berkshire Music Festival attracted 11,001 persons to Tanglewood.

Devoted to Bach

All three programs, Friday and Saturday evenings and yesterday afternoon, were devoted to music by Bach, with Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, leading the chamber orchestra.

The Saturday night concert, devoted mainly to Bach's piano concertos, was held in the big shed, which has had new acoustical facilities added this season. The other programs were in the [illegible] concert hall.

In addition to those who attended the main concerts, another 1,54[illegible] persons were present for the orchestra's open rehearsal Saturday morning.

Continues Wednesday

The festival continues Wednesday evening with the second in the weekly series of chamber music concerts. It will be given by the New York Pro Musica group and will consist of works by Monteverdi.

Next weekend the chamber orchestra will present three programs devoted to the work of Mozart. All will be directed by Dr Munch.

Music Review

Bach Weekend at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE TANGLEWOOD season got off to an official start this past weekend when Charles Munch led some 35 first-desk men from the Boston Symphony orchestra in three concerts devoted exclusively to the music of Johann Sebastian Bach. Two were played in the theater-concert hall; the second, Saturday night, was played in the great Shed and was the occasion of offering the audience the first chance to hear and the orchestra to test the new acoustic canopy which was erected just in time for the opening of this year's festival.

The new stage canopy was donated by Edna Betts Talbot as a memorial to her husband, the late Hawes Talbot. It is a huge and costly piece of construction, composed of jigsaw-puzzle triangles joined four to a unit in larger triangles leaving interstices of somewhat similar area and size through which hidden lights play down upon the performers and the music with theatrical intensity. It extends far out over the heads of the front rows of the audience. The sidewalls are serrated and the whole is painted a pewter gray with black purfling lines.

THE SOUND seems to come through more vividly and, especially in the strings, more clearly and true, although the problem of orchestral balance is not thus automatically solved, for the high D trumpet sometimes used Saturday night was still piercing and unpleasantly shrill.

YESTERDAY afternoon Munch and the orchestra were decidedly in the vein, and every item on the interesting and novel program went off with verve and elan. The loveliest of all the Brandenburg concerti, the sixth, in B flat major, opened the program and while Munch held the small ensemble with a check rein, the principals, violist Joseph de Pasquale and cellist Samuel Mayes, inspired their sections to exquisitely beautiful tone.

Bach often got musical ideas before he quite determined to which instrument or voice he would assign them. The wonderful cantata No. 51, "Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen" is one such instance for he gives a soprano a part which could possibly better be negotiated on an instrument. Soprano Bethany Beardslee, making her Tanglewood debut, made an exceptional impression with her lovely voice and superb musicianship. Trumpeter Roger Voisin played with admirable discretion and blended his remarkable tone in the background and the voice with conspicuous success, both in the opening aria and the closing Hallelujah. Miss Beardslee was given a tremendously vociferous and merited ovation.

ANOTHER FEATURE of the afternoon was the beautifully played concerto in D minor for violin and oboe in which Ruth Posselt and Ralph Gomberg were the soloists. Miss Posselt played with a full-throated and virile tone and produced a superb sound on all parts of her violin. In the impressive adagio she blended her instrument with Gomberg's exemplary oboe, matching phrase for phrase and never once resorting to a slide to mar the character and artistry of the performance.

The D major suite for the orchestra went off with virtuoso dispatch. We might quibble with the almost impossible tenuity of Munch's "Air," as we also might do with the strained refinement of the viola-cello Brandenburg with which he began, but there were so many other highly gratifying features to the performance that such slight demurrals were overweighted.

One must give Munch credit for varying his approach to music. It may be his mood at the moment or it may be the result of premeditation and cogitation. In any case, his tempi on Friday night, the evening of the first concert, were decidedly slower and less impulsive and more controlled and measured.

OF THE EIGHT or more times the third Brandenburg has been

played at Tanglewood this was by far the least speedy. It gained inflection and clarity although it yielded spontaneity. There have been reams written about Bach tempi and it would be difficult to sustain a point that by "allegro" in the first movement Bach had any deeper intention than to ask for a swift pace. As a matter of fact, of course, there is not even that indication in the score and so the program legend was gratuitous. But there can be no dispute about the general rhythmic rate. Now whether Bach intended his "allegro" to be cheerful as did Milton or lively as the Italian language signifies is a moot question. Friday it was neither.

Bach's son, Carl Philipp Emanuel, cautioned against taking allegros too fast in the music of his father's generation, and Munch would need less than that bit of testimony to justify his choice. The magnificent tone of his string section emerges more lucidly under such direction and is a joy in itself. Munch omitted the two-chord bridge entirely which separates (or joins) the two movements. At other performances another movement, of a slower tempo but from another of the same composer's works, is inserted here. When it is passed entirely, it is a question if the second allegro does not better follow without any pause whatsoever.

THE B MINOR suite No. 2 for flute and strings is by now a traditional spectacular at Tanglewood. The flute soloist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, plays it with breadth of understanding and brilliance of performance and the crowd goes wild every time. It is astute programming to place this at least before a long intermission if not at the very end of the program and old Sebastian was not so unmindful of audience reaction either that he was unaware that the fantastically stimulating "Badinerie" would do to end his suite. The enthusiasm this performance and the shy, demure but most capable soloist produce with this suite every time is completely predictable.

The "Musical Offering" is an exercise in composition with which Bach amused himself. He wrote it for four part harmony, the medium any student uses to either practice or express a theoretic musical idea. Bach never indicated whether he wanted it for string quartet, a larger ensemble, for wind instrument or, for that matter, for voices, where admittedly it would be a little intricate. Thus it has been transcribed and applied to every and any combination of instruments.

THE FRIDAY evening program ended with a lusty performance of the cantata No. 50, "Nun ist das Heil und die Kraft," sung by the Festival chorus prepared by Hugh Ross.

Bach left a great deal of confusion and doubt about his intentions in his concerti. He himself applied the same material for both keyboard and violin so that idioms which might lie conveniently for a pianist become awkward and maladroit for a stringed instrument and vice versa.

The D minor piano concerto is such a work. It is played as often by a violin as a piano. Saturday night it was one of two the great Tanglewood favorite, Lukas Foss, played to the intense enthusiasm of the large audience. The other was the F minor over which there is even some dispute as to authenticity.

FOSS IS a poet. In addition to all his other talents, he is a musician of integrity. He obviously holds Bach in as much, if not more, reverence and adoration than almost every other musician and he possesses in his capable fingers the means of expressing anything his musical intelligence prompts him to say. He is not necessarily called upon at this point to explain why he chooses to remove his shoes in the presence of Bach or why, to generate heat, he prefers to resort to rubbing two sticks together. To play in the Tanglewood shed as though he is playing in the privacy of his own studio is his privilege certainly, but if a soloist's responsibility is to convey music to his hearers, that is another matter.

He joined the orchestra in the vigorous tutti of the D minor concerto with strong abandon, but immediately dropped, in the initial solo, to a precious miniature style. And this pattern persisted during both the concerti. He sacrificed eloquence, and, for us, distorted the spirit of the music. It must be reported that there was no doubt whatsoever in the reactions of the huge audience, for they could not convey to him the full extent of their complete enrapturement.

FOSS was joined by pianists Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera in the two concerti for three claviers. This was excellent, straightforward pianism, and the three artists distributed the honors with equal artistry. The C major allows each of the three keyboards equal importance. In the D minor the first clavier is markedly prominent in the first movement, predominates in the second and only in the last are all three treated on an equality. It was as much fun to listen to as, apparently, it was to play.

Bach's Works Are Enjoyed At Tanglewood

By JOHN F. KYES

LENOX — Increased interest in the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood has been indicated by attendance for the first weekend, devoted entirely to the music of Bach. The total of 11,000 at three concerts substantially exceeded 1958, and also nudged out the good showing made in 1957.

The concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall on Friday night and Sunday afternoon presented a number of excellent soloists from the Tanglewood group, including flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer, soprano Bethany Beardslee, trumpeter Roger Voisin, violinist Ruth Posselt, oboist Ralph Gomberg and others. There were cantatas employing the Festival Chorus, Hugh Ross, director, and concertos and suites played by ensembles of 40 to 50 players, under Charles Munch.

Concerto In D Minor

On Saturday night, the concert, transferred into the large Music Shed, and enjoyed also by many hundreds on the surrounding grounds, featured Bach concertos for one piano and three pianos, minute change placed in the program, the Suite No. 4 in D major, securing added balance and variety in the evening.

Lukas Foss, applauded vigorously after the Concerto in F minor, No. 5, received an ovation after the Concerto in D minor, No. 1. Here was Bach in a mood not often revealed to the general public, who hear little except his organ pieces and sacred works. The F minor Concerto opened with an atmosphere of quiet beauty, with little repetitive phrases in the piano. The Largo found the very soft piano part almost mimicking the plucked strings in a poignant theme. The masterfully played Presto had strongly accented triple figures.

The D minor Concerto found the composer in a truly romantic mood, shared by soloist and conductor. The Allegro had the typical strong beginning, the lacy developments, and worked up to moments of considerable drama. The Adagio had a religious approach. The entire work brought unending tasks for the piano, and Munch smiled his approval, cajoled and wrought miracles of cooperative phrasing until at one time his handsome silver locks hung straight down over his eyes.

Berkowitz In Trio

The Concertos for three instruments, that in D minor, No. 1, and the final number in C major, No. 2, found Foss joined by Ralph Berkowitz, dean of the Berkshire Festival's Summer School, and Bernard Zighera, the orchestra's staff pianist. Here were three finely matched men, playing the most charming of music. There was an indescribable fluency and smoothness in the work of the soloists, backed by strings which at times sang as eloquently as human voices.

The opening Suite, which included in the ensmble various wind instruments, was a delight, a gem of many facets. The six episodes, ranging from the Overture to the final "Rejoicing" through a series of dainty dance forms, alternately mixed and displayed many voices charmingly.

The only thorn was a recurring tendency for the first trumpet to utter phrases far too stridently.

The coming weekend will be devoted entirely to the music of Mozart.

Tanglewood Season Opens With Boston Symphony Playing Bach

By D. E. RITZ
Gazette Music Editor

The opening weekend at Tanglewood, Lenox, in the Berkshires might well be called a Bach festival, featuring as it did concerti, suites, cantatas and the famous "Musical Offering" of Johann Sebastian Bach played by a picked group of 50 musicians from the Boston Symphony.

CHARLES MUNCH directed the programs held in the Theatre-Concert Hall and in the Shed.

We heard the opening program on Friday evening, sharing the experience with 3,283 other Bach enthusiasts. Both the Friday evening and Sunday afternoon performances were given in the Theatre-Concert Hall; the Saturday evening program was presented in the Music Shed with its new acoustical stage canopy.

The Friday evening program opened with the Brandenburg Concerto number 3 in G major for string orchestra. Its two contrasting allegro movements, its first an almost sedate four/four and the second a gay and lilting twelve/eight time signature, gave one an opportunity to fully enjoy the richness of the string tone of the organization and to admire the complexity of the writing.

DORIOT Anthony Dwyer, first flutist of the Boston Symphony, was the featured soloist with the orchestra in the "Suite number 2 in B minor for Flute and Strings." The work includes an overture, for strings alone; a Rondo, two Bourrees, a Polonaise and Double, a minuet and a gay closing "Badinerie." Mrs. Dwyer's tone is pure with an unusual limpid quality and her interpretation and that of the orchestra were a delight.

"Nun ist das Heil und die Kraft," the Cantata number 50 for double chorus and orchestra, closed the program. Magnificent choral writing with the orchestra augments by trumpets, tympany and organ, it made a most imposing close to the evening's program. The Festival Chorus, from which the double chorus was drawn, is directed by Hugh Ross.

THIS REVIEWER attended the concert for two reasons, first there was to be a performance of the famous "Musical Offering," second—it was opening night.

The "Musical Offering," written in 1747 for the King of Prussia and with its 13 contrapuntal numbers based on a theme provided by Frederick the Great, is a theoretical work, one not often heard on the concert stage.

Dr. Munch chose to present the two Ricercar movements, one in three and the other in six parts; several of the canons; the Trio Sonata in four movements for flute, cello, violin and piano; and the Conanic Fugue.

RICHARD BURGIN, concertmaster, Mrs. Dwyer, Samuel, Mayes, cello; and Bernard Zighera, piano, were featured in the "Trio Sonata." The effect was of fine silver filigree. The Ricercar movements, especially the last one in six parts, were like a many colored tapestry.

To musicians the experience was one long to be remembered and the audience was wildly enthusiastic.

Dr. Munch's conducting is a revelation and the orchestra responds to his slightest indication.

Professional musicians find the Music Shop, just inside the gate, a source of joy too. There one can obtain pocket scores of the various numbers to be played at a most nominal price.

Mozart programs are featured next weekend with Dr. Munch conducting.

Berkshire Festival Has Weekend Program

BY DON O. NOEL JR.

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the 1959 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood Friday evening with a smooth, well-disciplined concert of Bach music, ranging from the string orchestra Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 to the cantata, "Nun ist das Heil und die Kraft."

This Summer's series will continue this coming weekend with performances of Mozart Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon.

BY ALL MEANS the outstanding selection in the opening concert was the Suite No. 2 in B minor for Flute and Strings. Flutist was Doriot Anthony Dwyer, who performed the entire piece with sensitivity, and the final movement, the Badinerie, with breathless, bounding vitality that completely won over her audience.

The cantata was the weakest of the four pieces opening night, suffering primarily from a lack of discipline in the student chorus.

The opening number, the Brandenburg, demonstrated dramatically the right, vibrant sound which can be produced in Tanglewood's wooden theatre-concert hall, where the first two weeks' performances are held. Mr. Munch led the orchestra in a smooth, powerful, crisp performance which was beautiful.

The fourth piece, the Musikalisches Opfer, was a good reading which demonstrated well the precise logic of Bach's craftsmanship.

THIS WEEKEND'S Mozart performances will feature the G Major Piano Concert Friday night, with Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer as soloist; the Jupiter Symphony Saturday evening, and Sunday the Prague Symphony and the D Minor Requiem Mass.

The lovely grounds at Tanglewood were well-filled with strollers this weekend, and the lawn seating space in front of the concert hall was comfortably full for the opening concert.

BACH CONCERTOS FOR PIANO GIVEN AT TANGLEWOOD

Foss, Berkowitz, Zighera Featured in Program, Munch Conducts

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX—There may be many fine programs given during the current Berkshire festival at Tanglewood, but it is doubtful that any will be more entertaining than the one we listened to Saturday evening.

New Acoustic Setup

The program is devoted primarily to the piano concertos of Johann Sebastian Bach and it also included his Suite No. 4. The pianists were Lukas Foss, Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera. Charles Munch was the conductor.

The concert was given in the shed and its huge stage was the ideal site for the three large grand pianos, each with it white-coasted master sitting in front. It was a vastly impressive scene. One also had opportunity to gauge the effectiveness of the shed's new acoustic facility. Extending from the rear of the stage, it covers the stage and goes some distance into the seating area.

It is a web of triangles made of a special marine wood, but the total effect reminded us of a battalion of open winged bats in military formation coming straight at one. The various choirs of the orchestra came through with extreme clarity and the projection was something to marvel at.

Balanced Performance

Mr. Munch provided a nicely balanced and detailed performance of the suite. The dances are quite lovely and Mr. Munch stressed their variety and emphasized the invidualities which are numerous. It proved an ideal test of the acoustics.

Lukas Foss opened the pianistic portion of the program playing the "Concerto for Clavier in F minor, No. 5." To our mind Lukas Foss has few equals when it comes to playing the music of Bach or Mozart. He has the style, technique and sensitivity as well as an audience communication which is subtle and unobtrusive but strong.

In this concerto as well as in the "Concerto for Clavier in D Minor, No. 1" he displayed his unique gifts. Whether the music called for a tone of surpassing beauty as in the finale of the D Minor as in the slow movement of the F Minor Concerto, or demanded challenging digital fluency, as in the finale of the D Minor Concerto, Foss had what was needed. There were cheers and bravos aplenty after each of his performances.

Rich in Color

Because of a time limit we heard only the "Concerto for Three Claviers in D Minor, No. 1." Foss, Berkowitz and Zighera provided as fine and disciplined pianism as could be desired. Foss played the first piano but the ensemble was perfectly balanced and the performance was rich in color and vitality. The concerto is truly majestic, with a fine adagio and a brilliant and elaborate finale. Rapport between conductor and pianists was quite perfect.

This afternoon's program has its high points among the seldom heard "Concerto For Violin and Oboe in D Minor, "featuring Ruth Posselt and Ralph Gomberg as soloist; "Cantata No. 51," featuring soprano Bethany Beardsless, soprano and trumpeter Roger Voisin; the "Brandenberg Concerto No. 6 in B Flat Major," for strings and Suite No. 3 in D Major, for orchestra.

Charles Munch will conduct the performance in the theater concert hall.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

Brilliant 3 Days For Bach Lovers

By MILES KASTENDIECK

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS., July 6.—Tradition has dictated Bach for the opening concerts of the Berkshire Festival for years. The three-day session gave Bach devotees much to enjoy and Bach scholars plenty to discuss. Perfect weather drew 11,000 for the weekend.

For variety of program and quality of performance the concert yesterday was by far the best. The unusual nature of the Sixth Brandenburg Concerto with its violas and cellos provided a basis of contrast at the start. This was carried through with the Cantata No. 51 for soprano solo, and the Concerto for Violin and Oboe following; then the Suite No. 3 for the emergence of the full chamber orchestra.

The purists might begin arguing over not having the Sixth Brandenburg played in its original form, especially in the intimacy of the theatre-concert hall. They might wax eloquent about Charles Munch's highly personalized way with Bach, especially in the suite where the tempos and accents raised more than one eyebrow. The prformancs, however, caught th spirit of both.

Purity of Voice

Bethany Beardslee was the soprano soloist in competition with Roger Voisin, trumpet, in the cantata. In technical control, purity of voice, and clarity of line, she excelled. Her voice, however, sounded small within the group. Ruth Posselt, violin, and Ralph Gomberg, oboe, played the concerto, with distinction going to Gomberg for his exceptional performance, customary with him but nevertheless something worth a special trip to hear.

Fortunately the Saturday night program had been revised to include the Suite No. 4 for Orchestra, otherwise the originally planned diet of five clavier concertos would have been too much. Four brought satiety in spite of the novelty of having two of them for three pianos. Here again the scholars had a field day on the merits, demerits, and form of these works.

Lukas Foss dominated the evening by playing all four concertos. He was at his best in the D Minor, No. 1, where his articulate fingerwork also had more fire than in the F Minor, No. 5. This qualified as one of his superior performances. Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera joined him in the Concertos for Three Pianos in D Minor, No. 1, and C Major, No. 2. Generally the performances throughout the evening lacked the kind of integration that releases the spirit.

Sound Enhanced

This concert marked the debut of the new stage canopy in the music shed, $40,000 gift of Edna Betts Talbot of Boston. That it enhanced the brilliance of sound at the back of the shed and out on the lawns makes it quite an important addition. Nearer the stage the sound may be over-brilliant to the point of some reverberation. Without the full orchestra it is too soon to judge the total effectiveness.

The Friday program listed the Third Brandenburg, Suite No. 2, part of the "Musical Offering," and the Cantata No. 50. As a perennial favorite, the suite scored chiefly because of the delightful playing of Doriot Anthony Dwyer, the flute soloist. The consensus was that this concert was a warm-up for what blossomed forth yesterday.

The Sunday concert summed up the weekend splendidly and the suite sent the audience home full of good spirit.

Harry Lane Paintings on View At Tanglewood

An exhibition of paintings and drawings is now on view in the Glass Exhibition Room at the Main Gate of Tanglewood by Harry Lane. Mr. Lane, who lives in State Line, near Stockbridge, was trained in Munich and Paris and first came to the United States in 1925. Works by this prominent artist are also on view at the Berkshire Museum in Pittsfield. Included in the Tanglewood exhibit are: Copper Beeches; Stockbridge Bowl; Leopold Stokowski; Water Lily; Abandoned Nest; Late Harvest.

Future exhibitions at Tanglewood will include paintings by Berkshire County artists from the Tyringham Gallery from July 15 to July 19 and photographs by Miner Beale, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from July 22 through July 26.

Redwood and brass sculpture in the pools in the formal gardens at Tanglewood are by the Richmond sculptor, Homer Gunn. Three pieces represent stringed instruments, piano, and wind instruments and a fourth piece depicts birds in a bush.

HERALD TRIBUNE, MONDAY, JULY 6, 195

All-Bach Programs Given At Tanglewood Festival

By Francis D. Perkins

LENOX, Mass., July 5.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival completed this summer's first week end at Tanglewood with last night's and this afternoon's Bach programs under Charles Munch's direction.

The evening concert was the festival's first to be held in the music shed since the installation of its new stage canopy and roof, which were donated by Edna Betts Talbot, of Boston, in memory of her husband, the late Edmund Hawes Talbot, and will be formally dedicated Saturday. It replaces a stage shell which had served this festival from its beginning, and was showing signs of age.

The Acoustics

The new plywood canopy gives the music shed's stage a black border instead of the previous white one; the roof suggests a series of connected triangles, with other triangles seeming to fly high over the most forward seats.

The program was not of a type to give full account of the acoustic results, but they seemed very satisfying in resonance and sonority, and in carrying the music faithfully throughout the large shed and to the listeners outside under the stars.

Foss the Piano Soloist

As originally planned, the program offered five concertos for one or more claviers, but Mr. Munch substituted the Suite No. 4 in D as the opening item. Lukas Foss was the solo pianist in the concertos in F minor and D minor; Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera were his fellow soloists in the three-clavier concertos in D minor and C major. The substitution was an improvement, but still this was not a well chosen program, what with similarities in structure and scoring in most of its items and the occasional passages in the concertos which are well routined rather than musically evocative.

Grand Pianos Substituted

The use of modern grand pianos instead of harpsichords in the three-clavier concertos has a risk of overweighting the solo partts, but the admirably balanced performance avoided it entirely; unity and judiciousness of dynamic shading marked both the deft and fluent playing of the pianists and that of Mr. Munch's chamber ensemble in lucid and coherent interpretations which also reflected the atmosphere of the music.

In the solo concertos, persuasive, expressive discernment accompanies Mr. Foss's technical skill and musicianship. This was especially so in the imaginative delicacy of the largo in the F minor concerto and in his convincing projection of the tragic flavor which can be found in much of the D minor work. His interpretation gave this atmosphere distinct dramatic poignance, and the vigor with which he presented it seemed appropriate. The ovation which followed was unusually warm.

Attendance Up

Last night's attendance was 4,573, while 3,145 persons heard this afternoon's program in the theater concert hall. Counting Friday's concert and yesterday morning's public rehearsal, this makes a total of 11,001 for this week end, as compared to 9,716 for the corresponding 1958 concerts.

Ideal weather contributed to this notable showing. Today's Bach program, more diversified than yesterday's, began with a well co-ordinated, mellow-toned performance of the sixth Brandenburg concerto. Bethany Beardslee, soprano, was the singer in the solo cantata "Jauchzet Gott in Allen Landen," and Ruth Posselt and Ralph Gomberg, respectively, were the principals in the D minor concerto for violin and oboe, which prefaced the third suite in D minor.

Trumpet Brilliant

Miss Beardslee sang with musicianship, and the pervasive brightness of her tones kept them in the musical foreground without risk of being dominated by Roger Voisin's brillian trumpet playing or the spirited co-operation of the participating Bostonians. A little vocal tension could be observed at times, but this did not mar the continuity and the general realization of emotional resources of her singing.

Miss Posselt and Mr. Gomberg played skilfully and sympathetically in a concerto whose original solo assignment is not definitely known, but may have been for these two instruments. Bach has written more persuasive music for the third suite which brought the first festival week end to a sonorous, spirited close.

4,600 Attend Festival At Tanglewood

certs as guest conductor. The annual trek of music lovers from, it seems, just about everywhere has begun.

(Special to The American)

LENOX, MASS., July 6—This year's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood began most auspiciously with three concerts of Bach programs that drew large audiences and had many shouting "bravo" by the time the performers had finished. Almost 4,600 gathered in the music shed Saturday night for brilliant performances of Lukas Foss and the playing of Mr. Foss in a trio that included Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera. The season got under way Friday night when 3,100 gathered in the smaller theater-concert hall and overflowed onto the lawns outside. Sunday's concert was favored equally with fine weather and large numbers of listeners.

This week there will be three concerts with Charles Munch conducting all Mozart programs as has come to be the custom in these two weeks of music preceding the four weeks of concerts in the shed. And speaking of the shed at Tanglewood this year's audiences will be delighted with the new Edmund Hawes Talbot canopy which replaces the former shell used for 25 years of the Berkshire Festival concerts. This memorial canopy created through the gift of $40,000 is spectacular, theatrical, and a valuable addition to the shed and to listening. It is a study in geometrics that gives the music shed at Tanglewood a stage fit for a Rinehardt production. One almost expects to look up and see "Oedipus Rex" being presented. With it there is both improved listening and improved lighting of the musicians.

While we are writing of improvements at Tanglewood this year we must not forget that the new superintendent of grounds has gilded the lily by distributing at the entrance and about the grounds boxes of some of the largest geraniums we have seen in a long time. It adds materially to the beauty of the approach and of the grounds.

Saturday night's concert brought a matured and polished Lukas Foss to the platform in Bach's "Converto for Clavier in F Minor" and in the "Concerto for Clavier in D Minor, No. 1." Foss played with a delicacy and raptness that were revealing and gave the music the full and thundering force which it also called for. There were richly deserved bursts of applause and many "bravos." In the two concerts for three claviers, one in "D Minor, No. 1" and the other in "C Major, No. 2," the three pianists gave some fine team playing and made it a memorable performance of Bach. The group of players for these first two week-ends of Bach and Mozart gave the fine performance one expects of them and added materially to the success of the evening and of the other two concerts. Among soloists this year at the shed concerts will be Rudolf Serkin and Isaac Stern. Pierre Monteux will make his annual appearances in some of the con-

Munch Leads Bach at Lenox Opening

Lenox, Mass., July 6—Tanglewood told its season's first tale of music over the week-end with fair weather and Johann Sebastian Bach.

The three opening concerts of the Berkshire Festival here (Friday and Saturday nights and yesterday afternoon) drew a total of 11,001 listeners. They heard, altogether, five of the composer's concertos for assorted instruments; two Brandenburg Concertos, two Suites, two Cantatas and excerpts from "The Musical Offering." Charles Munch conducted a chamber orchestra of approximately 40 members of the Boston Symphony.

Encouraged by favorable temperatures and clear skies, the number of Bach devotees attending exceeded by 1,285 those who came last year for a similar series.

Friday night's and yesterday afternoon's events took place in the 1,200-seat Theater-Concert Hall. Saturday night's concert was held in the 6,000-seat Music Shed, which has added a new stage canopy.

Saarinen's Shed

When the present Shed was built in 1938, to a design by the late Finnish architect, Eliel Saarinen, the acoustical shell used for the old tent was retained. Famed for its contribution to the quality of sound, which critics have often described as excellent in the Shed, the tent has now succumbed to what Tennessee Williams refers to in "Sweet Bird of Youth" as "Time, the enemy of us all." In short, it was falling apart.

The grey canopy hardly looks impressive enough to have cost $65,000 despite its 67 overhanging triangular panels. Judging by one concert, it appears to be temperamental.

Close to the stage, the sound of four concertos for one and three pianos and orchestra was somewhat muffled and dull. Those sitting further back reported the vibrations to be brilliant.

Beginning July 17, the extent of the canopy's success can be more fairly appraised. Then, the full complement of the Boston Symphony (more than twice the number for the first two week-ends of Bach and Mozart) will play. All three of these concerts will be presented in the Shed.

More Variety Yesterday

While Saturday's concert benefited from the novelty of billing four pianos, yesterday's matinee offered more variety and interest.

Soprano Bethany Beardslee's performance of Bach's Cantata No. 51, "Praise God in All Lands," combined joyous intensity of mood with clean technical articulation of the fast passages. At times, Munch permitted the ensemble to play too loudly. Miss Beardslee was wise, nonetheless, to continue singing buoyantly, seemingly unconcerned with the surrounding heaviness. Roger Voisin played the trumpet obligato with ease and finesse.

During the Concerto for Violin and Oboe in D Minor, oboist Ralph Gomberg performed with careful phrasing and subtle distinctions in nuance. Violinst Ruth Posselt proved less sensitive, though her playing was vigorous and accurate.

Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 6 in B Flat Major for strings, which opened the program, employs the dark-colored viola as its top voice. With solo violist Joseph de Pasquale leading the section, the sombre blend added a distinguished interpretative quality to mellow beauty of sound.

Solo flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer's customary virtuosity in the Suite No. 2 in B Minor for Flute and Strings, was the high point of Friday's concert.

The glory of the choral writing in Cantata No. 50, for double chorus and orchestra, "Now Is Come Salvation," concluded the program. The brief work's victorious affirmation generated an exultant climax to the Festival's initial event.

Beginning Friday, the Mozart week-end will include the "Requiem" and Symphonies No. 39, 40 and 41.

New Tanglewood Shell Previewed at Concert

By ROSS PARMENTER
Special to The New York Times.

LENOX, Mass., July 5—The Shed at Tanglewood has a new orchestral shell. Its most striking feature is a modernistic canopy that fans out into the auditorium like a dark gray snake skin pulled progressively further apart toward its outermost edges.

The new shell will be dedicated next Saturday, but there was a preview of it last night at the second of the three concerts of the all-Bach week-end opening the twenty-second Berkshire Music Festival.

Eero Saarinen, who drew up the original plans for the Shed, and who also designed Tanglewood's Theatre-Concert Hall, was the chief architect of the shell. The $40,000 cost of its construction was the gift of Mrs. Edna Betts Talbot, in memory of her husband, the late Edmund Hawes Talbot, Boston lawyer.

The Shed's acoustics have always been good, so the shell's intention was not so much to improve them as to give the orchestra a reflector that was not on the verge of collapse. The big white box that has been serving, lo, these many years was the shell built for the first Berkshire Festival when it was given in the open on the Dan Hanna estate in 1934.

Originally, last night's concert was to consist of five of Bach's keyboard concertos, with Lukas Foss appearing in all of them. But preparation problems led to the dropping of the C Major Concerto for Two Claviers in favor of the Fourth Orchestral Suite.

Perhaps the substitution of the suite was all to the good, for even four Bach concertos tended to be a shade too much of one type of thing. But it was a beautiful and interesting concert, notwithstanding.

Mr. Foss played the two solo concertos—No. 5 in F minor and No. 1 in D minor—with the utmost poetic sensibility. And it was a rare novelty to hear both the concertos for three claviers on the same program.

To present them, the three grand pianos were set side by side at an angle on the forestage, while Charles Munch directed the orchestra from a counter angle on the right. With the three lids up, the three black pianos looked almost as modernistic as the triangular panels forming the open-work shell above them.

Ralph Berkowitz, the dean of the Berkshire Music Center, and Bernard Zighera, the harpist of the Boston Symphony, were Mr. Foss' keyboard colleagues. The triple concertos they performed were No. 1 in D minor and No. 2 in C major. The three pianists played with well-matched tones and remarkable rhythmic unison. The slow movements were particularly lovely.

This afternoon's concert, which was in the Theatre-Concert Hall, consisted of the Sixth Brandenburg Concerto, Cantata No. 51, "Jauchzet Gott in Allen Landen"; the D minor Concerto for Violin and Oboe and the third Orchestral Suite. Bethany Beardslee was the soprano soloist in the cantata and Roger Voisin was the trumpeter. The soloists in the concerto were Ruth Posselt, violinist, and Ralph Gomberg, oboist.

In all the performances devotion to Bach was put before personal display. Mr. Munch led the members of the Boston Symphony in a modest and straightforward manner and the soloists and ensemble players were all excellent musicians.

High points were the suave sounds of the seven viola players in the poignant adagio of the Brandenburg; the interweaving strands of Mr. Gomberg's oboe and Miss Posselt's violin in the adagio of the concerto and Miss Beadslee's singing. The soprano, as always, was as accurate as an instrumentalist, and her clear, light voice was as expressive in the florid passages as it was in the hushed recitative about the temple of God. And as one felt the religious sense of the work one heard the gentle rustle of leaves outside.

With its green lawns and tall, old trees Tanglewood was at its loveliest on this first of the festival's six week-ends. And those who came chiefly to hear Bach also were blessed with three days of golden summer weather. Altogether, there were 11,000 visitors, with the largest audience being the 4,573 who attended the concert last night.

4,600 Attend Festival At Tanglewood

(Special to The American)

LENOX, MASS., July 6—This year's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood began most auspiciously with three concerts of Bach programs that drew large audiences and had many shouting "bravo" by the time the performers had finished. Almost 4,600 gathered in the music shed Saturday night for brilliant performances of Lukas Foss and the playing of Mr. Foss in a trio that included Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighere. The season got under way Friday night when 3,100 gathered in the smaller theater-concert hall and overflowed onto the lawns outside. Sunday's concert was favored equally with fine weather and large numbers of listeners.

This week there will be three concerts with Charles Munch conducting all Mozart programs as has come to be the custom in these two weeks of music preceding the four weeks of concerts in the shed. And speaking of the shed at Tanglewood this year's audiences will be delighted with the new Edmund Hawes Talbot canopy which replaces the former shell used for 25 years of the Berkshire Festival concerts. This memorial canopy created through the gift of $40,000 is spectacular, theatrical, and a valuable addition to the shed and to listening. It is a study in geometrics that gives the music shed at Tanglewood a stage fit for a Rinehardt production. One almost expects to look up and see "Oedipus Rec" being presented. With it there is both improved listening and improved lighting of the musicians.

While we are writing of improvements at Tanglewood this year we must not forget that the new superintendent of grounds has gilded the lily by distributing at the entrance and about the grounds boxes of some of the largest geraniums we have seen in a long time. It adds materially to the beauty of the approach and of the grounds.

Saturday night's concert brought a matured and polished Lukas Foss to the platform in Bach's "Converto for Clavier in F Minor" and in the "Concerto for Clavier in D Minor, No. 1." Foss played with a delicacy and raptness that were revealing and gave the music the full and thundering force which it also called for. There were richly deserved bursts of applause and many "bravos." In the two concerts for three claviers, one in "D Minor, No. 1" and the other in "C Major, No. 2," the three pianists gave some fine team playing and made it a memorable performance of Bach. The group of players for these first two week-ends of Bach and Mozart gave the fine performance one expects of them and added materially to success of the evening and of the other two concerts. Among soloists this year at the shed concerts will be Rudolf Serkin and Isaac Stern. Pierre Monteux will make his annual appearances in some of the concerts as guest conductor. The annual trek of music lovers from, it seems, just about everywhere has begun.

New Stage Canopy in the Shed Acclaimed 'A Great Success'

TANGLEWOOD—The new stage canopy in the Music Shed was acclaimed "a great success" Saturday night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Charles Munch conducting, gave the first BSO performance of the season in the huge auditorium.

A crowd of 4,573 was on hand for the performance in the Shed. Hundreds listened from the spacious lawns surrounding the pavilion, including acoustical engineers, BSO officials, musicians, newspapermen and others. Several persons walked as far as the administration building and others into the formal gardens to determine whether the sound from beneath the new canopy carried that far. All were in agreement that the new structure gives a more even distribution and reflection of sound than the 25-year-old shell which had been used for symphony concerts in the Berkshires since the Festival idea was originated in 1934 at the Dan Hanna Farm.

$40,000 Gift

The new canopy is the gift of Mrs. Edna Betts Talbot of Boston, who has given $40,000 to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the cost of its construction as a memorial to her late husband, Edmund Hawes Talbot, Boston lawyer and member of the firm of Tower, Talbot & Hiler.

Among those attending the Saturday night concert was Leo Beranek, an acoustical engineer of the firm of Bolt, Beranek and Newman Inc., of Cambridge, who served as acoustical consultants with the architectural firm of Eero Saarien & Associates of Bloomfield Hills, Mich., in planning the canopy. The construction work was done by Ernest J. Cramer Inc., of Pittsfield. With Mr. Beranek at the concert was Russell Johnson, an acoustical consultant with the firm.

11,001 Attend Concerts

The weatherman cooperated fully for the first weekend concerts at Tanglewood, which attracted 11,001 persons. On Friday evening when the first Bach concert was given in the theater-concert hall, 3,283 persons attended and yesterday afternoon 3,145 heard the concert in the theatre.

Managers of major orchestras from all parts of the country will arrive at Tanglewood over the weekend as guests of the BSO for their annual meeting.

In addition to attending concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch on Friday and Saturday evenings, July 11 and 12, and observing the activities of the Berkshire Music Center, managers and their wives will have an opportunity to meet a number of Berkshire residents during their stay. Luncheons, teas and dinners will be given for the visitors by Mrs. Lawrence K. Miller of Pittsfield, Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky of Lenox, widow of the founder of the Berkshire Music Center, Mrs. C. D. Jackson of Lenox, whose husband is a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Thomas D. Perry Jr., wife of the orchestra's manager.

Dedication Saturday

A special feature of the visit will be the dedication of the new acoustical stage canopy in the Tanglewood Music Shed on Saturday evening. Mrs. Talbot will be present for the dedication.

Managers who will attend the meetings on the Tanglewood grounds will include: William Herring (Atlanta Symphony); Betty Danneman (Baltimore Symphony); Thomas D. Perry Jr. and Norman S. Shirk (Boston Symphony); Ramsi P. Tick (Buffalo Symphony); George Kuyper (Chicago Orchestra); Craig Hutchinson (Cincinnati Symphony); A. Beverly Barksdale (Cleveland Orchestra); Alan Watrous (Dallas Symphony); Howard Harrington (Detroit Symphony); Tom Johnson (Houston Symphony); George Morgulis (Kansas City Symphony); Alice Taylor (Los Angeles Philharmonic); Boris Sokoloff (Minneapolis Symphony); Pierre Beique (Montreal Symphony); Jack F. Dailey (New Orleans Philharmonic); George Judd Jr., Carlos Moseley and Silas Edman (New York Philharmonic); Roger Hall (Philadelphia Orchestra); John Edwards (Pittsburgh Orchestra); Tom Iannaccone (Rochester Philharmonic); Clinton Norton (San Antonio Symphony); William Zalken (St. Louis Symphony); Jack Elton (Toronto Symphony).

11,001 Bach Devotees Attend Festival's Weekend Concerts

The first weekend of the Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Charles Munch, drew a total of 11,001 devotees of the music of Johann Sebastian Bach. Sunny skies and cool starlit evenings prevailed throughout the weekend.

Friday evening's concert included the third Brandenburg Concerto for Strings, played with flawless clarity and moderate pace, the Second Suite in B minor now a tradition, with Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer as the solo flutist giving a smoothly executed performance for which she was recalled many times, and the seldom heard "Musical Offering," abridged but still lengthy, finely played by Dr. Munch, soloists and the orchestra, and rather tiring.

Saturday's concert was held in the Big Shed, with its newly dedicated sound stage. Two Concertos for one Clavier were performed with moving style by Lukas Foss, the F minor Allegro, a gentle battle of tempi between Mr. Foss and Dr. Munch, which eventually was resolved, the profound delicacy of the Largo was beautifully exhibited by Mr. Foss and the particular tonal acoustics of the new stage, with the ornamental runs of the D minor Allegros drawn with technical vigor and roundness throughout.

Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera joined Mr. Foss in the two Concerti for Three Claviers, in C major and D minor. Playing in unison or harmonious combination, the three performed with excellent regard for style, coordination and musical intent. The hearing of these was indeed a rare treat; the supporting strings carefully integrated by Dr. Munch.

The revised program opened with the Fourth Suite in D major, a lengthy but abundant Overture, the all too brief and bouncy Bourrees, the deliberate Minuet, and wonderfully ebullient Rejoussance, all played with that insouciant sense of Bach Dr. Munch imparts to his responsive orchestral group.

Sunday's concert was played in the Theatre-Concert hall, opening with the darkly-colored Sixth Brandenburg Concerto for Strings, velvety and warmly wrought. The technically and musically demanding Cantata No. 51, "Jauchzet Gott in Allen Landen," was sung by soprano Bethany Beardslee with tonal depth and rich musical feeling; the Andante and Aria were especially evocative with only bass and continuo accompaniment. Roger Voisin performed the difficult trumpet solos with his usual expert virtuosity, it is a glorious Chorale, and the audience responded with lengthy applause for the gracious soprano and the small orchestral ensemble.

Variations in familiar tempi should be welcome, no doubt, and in oft-played music: those in the Concerto for Violin and Oboe, with repeated hearing could become acceptable and endurable, especially with such accomplished soloists and musicians; but the agonizing stretch of the too-familiar Air for the G String in the Third Suite could not, to this listener's taste ever be convincingly musical, as Dr. Munch interpreted it for the close of Sunday's otherwise enjoyable and satisfying program.

Next weekend's concerts will be devoted to the music of Mozart and will feature Nicloe Henriot-Schweitzer as piano soloist on Friday evening in the G major Concerto K 453, three Symphonies, 39, 40 and 41 on Saturday evening, and 38 and the Requiem Mass in D minor, K 626 with the Festival Chorus on Sunday.—M. deB. B.

HEDGE WEDGE causes Tanglewood maestro Charles Munch to grin as he nearly becomes hemlocked while shortcutting through shrubbery of the formal gardens.

Second Thoughts on Music

Bach's Music Given Fine Attention at Tanglewood

Three Festival Concerts Devoted to His Work Greatly Appreciated by Big Audiences; Orchestra, Soloists Praised

By WILLARD M. CLARK

Johann Sebastian Bach was well served by Charles Munch and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and various soloists during the three concerts of the current Berkshire Music Festival devoted to his music. Ideal weather conditions brought out 11,001 persons to the three concerts, with the concert devoted to the clavier concertos luring 4573 people to Tanglewood.

These are interesting audiences who are present to listen to music and they listen attentively to music which they have less opportunity of hearing than the other repertory. We noticed particularly that those sitting outside the Theater or Shed maintained absolute quiet, hissing gently at those who wandered on to the gravel walks instead of walking on the grass.

Bethany Beardslee

Two of the Bandenburg concertos were featured Nos. 3 and 6. Aside from a very deliberate tempo the works were played with polish and the full beauty of the symphony strings were revealed. Two of Master's cantatas were offered. The first was Cantata No. 50 for double chorus and orchestra. Hugh Ross had trained the Festival chorus but even his magic could not turn out a finished group in four days. As it was, the chorus revealed plenty of vitality and its performance augured well for future appearances.

A charming lyric soprano named Bethany Beardslee, a member of the New York Pro Musica, was heard in the Cantata No. 51, "Jauchzet Gott in Allen Landen." This is a tremendously taxing work, a monumental work in fact. Miss Beardslee has a lovely pure and flexible soprano. She handles it expertly and her musicianship is impeccable as is her enunciation. The only flaw was the fact that the cantata demands a larger voice to utter joyous Alleluias convincingly. Roger Voisin's trumpet was strong voiced and imperious.

Doriot Anthony Dwyer, first flutist of the orchestra, reaped her personal triumph as soloist in the "Suite No. 2 for Flute and Strings." This fine artist played with beauty of tone, unerring taste and sent out a personal magnestism that enchanted the audience. She received several recalls, but Mr. Munch did now allow a repeat of the final Badinerie as he usually has done.

Among the less often heard works was the "Musical Offering." Mr. Munch made brief cuts in the lengthy work so it lasted only 35 minutes. This work is a challenge and a delight to both students of composition and the lay listener. Bach brought to the work all his tremendous engenuity and theoretical skill and invention. Yet, what might easily have become a theoretical exercise emerged as a charming listening experience. It was beautifully performed.

Lukas Foss

The concert devoted to the clavier concertos could have been very tiresome had not it been performed with such virtuosity. There were two concertos for single piano hotse in F minor, No. 5 and D minor, No. 1 and two concertos for three pianos, the C major, No. 2 and D minor, No. 1. Lukas Foss, one of the finest interpreters of the music of Bach and Mozart, played the two concertos for single piano. It was beautiful and expressive pianism he provided, particularly in the exquisite Largo for F minor and the brilliant finale to the D minor. Pianists for the three clavier concertos were Lukas Foss, Bernard Zighera and Ralph Berkowitz. These three accomplished musicians provided carefully conceived and rewarding performances. Mr. Munch had programmed the concerto for two pianos in C major, No. 2, but apparently was prevailed upon to eliminate it and he substituted the Suite No. 4.

Another rarely heard and vastly interesting works was the "Concerto for Violin and Oboe, in D minor." Ruth Posselt, violin and Ralph Gomberg, oboeist, were the skilled soloists. This is a lovely work, rich in texture and built on salient thematic material rather than on shifting harmonies. Only in the final movement is the full orchestra brought to the fore. The first movement is a duet with plenty of give and take with the oboe heard to particular advantage. The long Adagio is even more a duet for the sustaining instruments, the two delicately interwoven voices accompanied by plucked strings. The Springfield Symphony Orchestra might do well to investigate this concerto.

This afternoon at 2.30 p. m. in the Theater, there will be a performance of the Mozart "Requiem" Mass in D minor. Participants will be the Festival chorus and the solo quartet consisting of Adele Addison, soprano; Florence Kopleff, alto; Blake Stern, tenor and Donald Gramm, bass. Mr. Munch will open the program with the "Symphony in D major, No. 38" known as the "Prague" symphony.

HEMIDEMISEMIQUAVERS

There are several interesting items in the way of music news this week. In the first plac I read a most interesting article on "Taping the Bolshoi", or "How Hollywood Taped the Bolshoi Ballet." As you know impresario Sol Hurok, who is probably the most famous impresario of all time and certainly the most spectacular after Barnum and Bailey, brought the Bolshoi Ballet to America at his own risk; and profited by the venture. Matty Fox of Hollywood bought the rights from him to film the ballet, for $550,000 and in turn paid more than $650,000 to have four, hour-long films done of the ballet.

It is not known yet whether he will sell the films to a commercial sponsor: run TV shows on a closed circuit sort of basis, and ask each person to pay to see the ballet or maybe sell the films for a movie. A reviewer of such projects, Miss Laddie Marshack of the West Coast, wrote an inside story of the ballet as they were being filmed.

First of all they had to bridge the gap between the dancers' lack of knowledge of the English language. At first the director would yell "Stop!" to the dancers and the interpreter would yell "Stoy!" Later it was changed around and the Americans were yelling "Stoy" and the Russians, "Stop!" They readily adjusted themselves to on the scene behavior and food. One could hear them yelling for "Beeg dogs", (hot-dogs) and "juze" (juice). Prima Ballerina Galina Ulanova refused to redance her numbers for the numerous takes necessary, and only once did she repeat a dance. So that the cameramen and director had to be extra careful when she danced that everything was all set.

It is good to know that there are these films and that we shall have another opportunity to see this wonderful ballet.

The 22nd Berkshire Music Festival opened at Tanglewood Friday, July 3 with an all-Bach program, following a tradition established during World War II. There was an audience of 3,283, and as an indication of the festival's growth through the years, last year drew audiences totaling 168,778.

Metropolitan Opera promises to have the longest season in its history this coming year. For many years the demands have been great for its appearance on tour on large cities. Atlanta asked for a full week for 1960 and has been promised this time. Some short engagements have been cancelled, since the production loses money on short engagements, having to unload and set up so much stage property.

Because of the fact that the old Metropolitan Opera Building was not air-conditioned the weather became unseasonably warm and necessitated the shortening of the season. But the new auditorium in Lincoln Park will be air-conditioned and so the season may extend from its present one of 24 weeks (25 next year) to 30 weeks.

Dublin, Ireland is having its own festival this year. It is the first summer festival in Dublin's history, and will include opera, symphony, soloists and a most creditable program.

Young and beautiful Joanne Mitchell excelled as violin soloist in an all-Mendelssohn program at the Lewisohn Stadium last week. These concerts "under the stars," are given at the immense stadium, with some reserved seats and thousands on the concrete bleachers. Top-notch artists are presented through the generosity of New York patrons, and music lovers are privileged to hear them at a nominal gate entrance free.

Bach and Mozart at Tanglewood

The twenty-second Berkshire Festival opened at Tanglewood, July 3, and in accordance with tradition the first two week-ends were devoted respectively to Bach and Mozart. One of the big events of the second week-end was the formal dedication of the new acoustical stage canopy in the 6,000 seat Music Shed, July 11. The canopy, designed by Eero Saarinen and Associates, was made possible through the generous contribution by Mrs. Edna Betts Talbot in memory of her late husband, Edmund Hawes Talbot. Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony, had previously made a gift of $10,000 toward the replacement of the old shell. Actually, the July 11 concert was the third heard in the Shed this season, for the concerts on July 4 and 10 were also played there. The new canopy is an interesting-looking modern affair, with triangles of increasing size as it goes out toward the audience. The acoustics are perhaps a little better, and that is the most important thing.

On July 3, the Bach program included the Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G; Suite No. 2 in B minor for flute and strings; the Musical Offering and Cantata No. 50. It was held in the Theatre-Concert Hall, and featured the beautiful flute playing of Doriot Anthony Dwyer, first flutist of the Boston Symphony. The July 4 concert in the Shed boasted three keyboard artists, Lukas Foss, Ralph Berkowitz, dean of the Berkshire Music Center, and Bernard Zighera, harpist of the Boston Symphony. They played on three adjacent grand pianos, with the three lids up forming a design matching that of the new canopy. The works were Bach's triple concertos No. 1 in D minor and No. 2 in C major. The artists played well together, in fine rhythmic and interpretive unison. Mr. Foss also played two solo concertos, No. 5 in F minor and No. 1 in D minor, with unusual sensitivity. The final Bach concert of the week-end, again in the Theatre-Concert Hall, included the Sixth Brandenburg Concerto; Cantata No. 51, with Bethany Beardslee, soprano, as soloist; the D minor Concerto for Violin and Oboe, with Ruth Posselt, violinist, and Ralph Gomberg, oboist, as soloists; and the Orchestra Suite No. 3. Dr. Munch was in good form in all three concerts.

While the Bach week-end was sunny and pleasant, the Mozart week-end had much threatening weather. Because of the downpour on July 10, the first of these concerts was shifted from the Theatre-Concert Hall to the Shed. The program opened with the overture to "Don Giovanni" followed by the Piano Concerto in G major, K. 453, with Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer as soloist. The pianist gave a delicate and refined performance, particularly effective in the slow movement. The balance of the program included the Divertimento in B flat major, for Strings and Two Horns and the "Haffner" Symphony. Dr. Munch interpreted these works with strength and joy—here was not a delicate Mozart but a zestful one. On July 11, there were three symphonies, Nos. 39, 40, and 41—all in a row, three sparkling jewels that glowed brightly. July 12, the afternoon concert was held in the Theatre-Concert Hall. The two works were the "Prague" Symphony and the Requiem Mass in D Minor. The Symphony was performed in the vigorous style, characteristic of Munch's other Mozart interpretations. In the Requiem Mass, the soloists were Adele Addison, soprano, Florence Kopleff, contralto, Blake Stern, tenor, and Donald Gramm, bass, all excellent in their parts. Dr. Munch's dramatic flair was used to good advantage in a performance of interesting contrasts and intensity.

Piano Guild Auditions Attract 160 Youngsters

By Alfred W. Burke

LOWELL—The third annual Piano Guild piano auditions, completed Wednesday at Lowell State Teachers college, attracted a total of 160 younger aspirants. About 25 students played each day and each was carefully judged on the basic as well as the more advanced elements in respect to musicianship and playing ability.

Miss Eva M. Lequin, chairman, and originator of the idea for this district reported that each of the students received a passing grade, and that several in the more advanced class, gained special awards for outstanding talent and promise in regards to a musical future.

Members of the auditions board expressed their thanks and appreciation for the co-operation and assistance received from Dr. Daniel H. O'Leary and the staff of the department of music at the college. This event has brought to the community and to the school an opportunity to advance the cause of music, and all concerned did much to make Lowell a center or art.

There were many teachers who assisted as members of the general committee. Pianists from this city, Chelmsford, Dracut, Lawrence, Andover and Wakefield participated.

The Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, will sponsor a program of study of contemporary music at the 1959 session of the Berkshire Music center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts. The program, which was begun in 1956 at Tanglewood, will be under the supervision of the staff of the school's composition department under the direction of Aaron Copland, with the assistance of Lukas Foss and Leon Kirchner.

A concert of Contemporary Chamber music sponsored by the foundation will be performed on Monday evening, July 13 at 8:30, by members of the Boston Symphony orchestra and guest artists, including the noted pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma. The program will include the Sonata for Flute and Piano by Serge Profofieff; the Piano Quartet by Ingolf Dahl (commissioned by the Fromm Foundation for the Festival of Contemporary Arts at the University of Illinois and first performed there); Jancek's "Diary of One Who Vanished", 22 Poems for Tenor, Alto and Trio of Women's Voices; and Three Ricercari for instrumental ensemble by Arnold Francchetti. This last work also commissioned, will receive its first performance at this concert.

Another popular part of this program will be the revival of the afternoon series of lecture-recitals. These to be given on Fridays, will be included in the seminar in Contemporary Music. Appearing in the series will be Aaron Copland, Gunther Schuller, Lukas Foss, Robert Craft and Ernst Krenek.

MUSIC

Everyone Is A Performer Through Modern Gadgets

By GORDON E. ARMSTRONG

Modern technical ingenuity and accomplishment is making it easier for practically everybody to get more enjoyment from music. That results, of course, from participation. The do-it-yourself idea — becoming a performer rather than a listener — was pointed up in the recent annual Music Industry Trade Show at the Hotel New Yorker in New York.

Everyone at the exhibition seemed to be enjoying himself except perhaps, music teachers. Actually, music teachers may reap an unexpected harvest through a more general interest in musical instruments, gadgets, and notation systems designed principally for musical illiterates. To amend an old proverb, it may be said that a little musical knowledge can be a beneficial thing to all concerned excepting possibly those who have to listen to a beginner's struggling efforts. However, latent musical talents are bound to be discovered with inevitable benefits to teachers resulting.

For instance, a new import from Italy in the chord-organ category, comes complete with its own novel notation system. Purchasers of the instrument, which has a two-octave keyboard and the buttons for chords similar to our increasingly popular domestic instrument, receive an assortment of familiar tunes which even a five-year old can play. Keys are numbered from one to sixteen with plus signs to indicate the black notes. Notes also appear in standard music notation which many will undoubtedly learn to read and perhaps go on from there to lessons with a professional teacher. Incidentally, this Italian organ called the "Concert Companion" is a portable instrument which can be folded up and carried in a suitcase-sized package weighing 25 pounds.

Another instrument on display, for those who prefer to "blow their own horn," was a reed instrument made by Hohner. Instead of the usual finger holes characteristic of wind instruments, this gadget enables the performer to obtain various pitches by means of a piano-style keyboard running the length of the instrument. To mention but one other novelty, a guitar this time, the customary fingering method is eliminated by means of a clamp placed on the strings. By turning a dial, the principal chords in the key of C—tonic, subdominant, dominant, relative minors, and other necessary chords may be obtained.

According to a piano company official at the show, an almost extinct instrument which enjoyed an immense popularity up until the twenties, is making a strong comeback. In fact, since this instrument required nothing more than a strong pair of feet on the part of the performer, it is somewhat hard to understand why it ever disappeared from the average family living room. The instrument is, of course, the player-piano which used to intrigue young and old and helped to keep the old fireside more attractive in the "good old days."

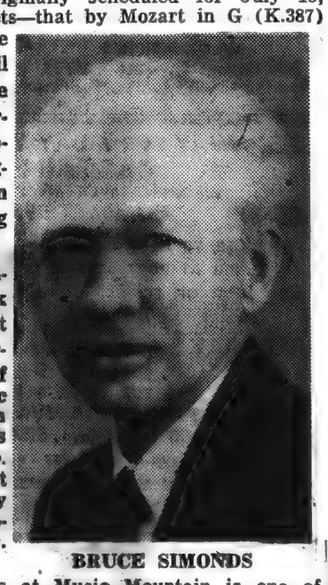
Back in 1919-20, the popularity of the player-piano may be deduced from the fact that 70 per cent of the 364,000 pianos made by manufacturers in this country were "players."A decade or so later, the newly-found interest in radio and phonograph records (with an assist from the depression) had cut the sale of pianos to 27,000 in 1932. This figure included only a few player-pianos. According to the piano company representative, the player-piano is now finding a place in rumpus rooms along with TV and hi-fi sets. They should be ideal for whiling away time during those endless commercials!

Strictly speaking, one doesn't make his own music with a player-piano but merely assists in the process. However, I am sure that the manufacturers have missed a good selling point which I'll pass along to them for free. Doctors will tell you that modern man doesn't use his legs enough—walking, hiking, bicycling, etc. If you've ever pumped the pedals on a player-piano, you know it's good exercise. So here's a slogan, gentlemen, for what it is worth — "Put a song in your heart and a healthy glow in your cheeks with a player-piano!" Another might be — "piano 'roll your own' and keep healthy." Perhaps we had better quit while we're ahead, as they say.

BERKSHIRE STRING QUARTET IN NORFOLK

A change in the schedule will bring the Berkshire String Quartet to Norfolk for the third concert of the Norfolk Music School series on Wednesday afternoon at 3:30. Warren Stannard, solo oboist of the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra and a faculty member of the Yale school this summer, is to be the guest artist.

Wednesday's program, originally scheduled for July 15, will present two string quartets—that by Mozart in G (K.387) and Schubert's "Death and the Maiden" quartet. Stannard will be heard with the Berkshire players in Arnold Cooke's Quartet for oboe and strings, published three years ago in England and dedicated to Leon Goossens and the Carter String Trio.



BRUCE SIMONDS

Incidentally, pianist Bruce Simonds, director of the Norfolk Music School, is to be the guest artist with the Berkshire Quartet in the opening program of the 30th anniversary Music Mountain series this afternoon at 4. The program includes Haydn's Quartet in D major (Op. 20, No. 4), the A major Quartet for piano and strings by Brahms (Op. 26), and Beethoven's Quartet in C major (Op. 59, No. 3).

The chamber music series at Music Mountain is one of the oldest of its kind in this country. Jacques Gordon, leader of the former Gordon Quartet, inaugurated these concerts in 1929. The Berkshire Quartet, reorganized from the Gordon ensemble after the leader's death in 1948, has since carried on the fine musical tradition established by the eminent violinist in these concerts at Falls Village, Conn.

The present series will present programs featuring eminent guest artists every Sunday afternoon through September 6.

MUSIC FESTIVAL SCHEDULED TO BEGIN

The ninth annual Connecticut Valley Music Festival also gets under way this week with a program at the Valley Regional High School in Deep River on Thursday evening at 8:30. There are to be five concerts in this latest series which are again to be given under the direction of the New York baritone, Alfred Zega.

Zega is to be one of the two artists who are to be heard in Thursday's program. He will present Schumann's celebrated song cycle, the Liederkreiss.

The young American pianist, Herbert Stessin, will be the director's fellow artist. His contributions will include two Scarlatti sonatas, Beethoven's Sonata in D minor (Op. 31), and Schumann's Fantasie in C major (Op. 17).

The New York Herald Tribune carried this comment about a recent Stessin performance — "Mr. Stessin has the gift and he has it in a big way. He is as good an answer to Van Cliburn as this critic has encountered the season long."

MOZART TO BE FEATURED AT FESTIVAL

Music by Mozart will be performed exclusively in the second group of three concerts scheduled for the coming weekend at the Berkshire Music Festival. Charles Munch will again conduct all of these programs.

The accomplished young French pianist, Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, will have a featured role in Friday evening's concert when she will play the G major Piano Concerto (K. 453). The Overture to "Don Giovani," the "Haffner" Symphony, and the Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns (K. 287) complete the program.

Three symphonies — Nos. 39 and 40, and the "Jupiter" will comprise Saturday evening's concert at which the new concert shell in the Music Shed will be dedicated.

Next Sunday afternoon's program will feature a performance of the Requiem Mass in D minor with the following soloists: Adele Addison, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; Blake Stern, tenor, and Donald Gamm, bass. The "Prague" Symphony will open the program.

New Stage Canopy in the Shed Acclaimed 'A Great Success'

TANGLEWOOD—The new stage canopy in the Music Shed was acclaimed "a great success" Saturday night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Charles Munch conducting, gave the first BSO performance of the season in the huge auditorium.

A crowd of 4,573 was on hand for the performance in the Shed. Hundreds listened from the spacious lawns surrounding the pavilion, including acoustical engineers, BSO officials, musicians, newspapermen and others. Several persons walked as far as the administration building and others into the formal gardens to determine whether the sound from beneath the new canopy carried that far. All were in agreement that the new structure gives a more even distribution and reflection of sound than the 25-year-old shell which had been used for symphony concerts in the Berkshires since the Festival idea was originated in 1934 at the Dan Hanna Farm.

$40,000 Gift

The new canopy is the gift of Mrs. Edna Betts Talbot of Boston, who has given $40,000 to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the cost of its construction as a memorial to her late husband, Edmund Hawes Talbot, Boston lawyer and member of the firm of Tower, Talbot & Hiler.

Among those attending the Saturday night concert was Leo Beranek, an acoustical engineer of the firm of Bolt, Beranek and Newman Inc., of Cambridge, who served as acoustical consultants with the architectural firm of Eero Saarien & Associates of Bloomfield Hills, Mich., in planning the canopy. The construction work was done by Ernest J. Cramer Inc., of Pittsfield. With Mr. Beranek at the concert was Russell Johnson, an acoustical consultant with the firm.

11,001 Attend Concerts

The weatherman cooperated fully for the first weekend concerts at Tanglewood, which attracted 11,001 persons. On Friday evening when the first Bach concert was given in the theater-concert hall, 3,283 persons attended and yesterday afternoon 3,145 heard the concert in the theatre.

Managers of major orchestras from all parts of the country will arrive at Tanglewood over the weekend as guests of the BSO for their annual meeting.

In addition to attending concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch on Friday and Saturday evenings, July 11 and 12, and observing the activities of the Berkshire Music Center, managers and their wives will have an opportunity to meet a number of Berkshire residents during their stay. Luncheons, teas and dinners will be given for the visitors by Mrs. Lawrence K. Miller of Pittsfield, Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky of Lenox, widow of the founder of the Berkshire Music Center, Mrs. C. D. Jackson of Lenox, whose husband is a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Thomas D. Perry Jr., wife of the orchestra's manager.

Dedication Saturday

A special feature of the visit will be the dedication of the new acoustical stage canopy in the Tanglewood Music Shed on Saturday evening. Mrs. Talbot will be present for the dedication.

Managers who will attend the meetings on the Tanglewood grounds will include: William Herring (Atlanta Symphony); Betty Danneman (Baltimore Symphony); Thomas D. Perry Jr. and Norman S. Shirk (Boston Symphony); Ramsi P. Tick (Buffalo Symphony); George Kuyper (Chicago Orchestra); Craig Hutchinson (Cincinnati Symphony); A. Beverly Barksdale (Cleveland Orchestra); Alan Watrous (Dallas Symphony); Howard Harrington (Detroit Symphony); Tom Johnson (Houston Symphony); George Morgulis (Kansas City Symphony); Alice Taylor (Los Angeles Philharmonic); Boris Sokoloff (Minneapolis Symphony); Pierre Beique (Montreal Symphony); Jack F. 4,600 Attend Festival At Tanglewood

(Special to The American)

LENOX, MASS., July 6—This year's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood began most auspiciously with three concerts of Bach programs that drew large audiences and had many shouting "bravo" by the time the performers had finished. Almost 4,600 gathered in the music shed Saturday night for brilliant performances of Lukas Foss and the playing of Mr. Foss in a trio that included Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighere. The season got under way Friday night when 3,100 gathered in the smaller theater-concert hall and overflowed onto the lawns outside. Sunday's concert was favored equally with fine weather and large numbers of listeners.

This week there will be three concerts with Charles Munch conducting all Mozart programs as has come to be the custom in these two weeks of music preceding the four weeks of concerts in the shed. And speaking of the shed at Tanglewood this year's audiences will be delighted with the new Edmund Hawes Talbot canopy which replaces the former shell used for 25 years of the Berkshire Festival concerts. This memorial canopy created through the gift of $40,000 is spectacular, theatrical, and a valuable addition to the shed and to listening. It is a study in geometrics that gives the music shed at Tanglewood a stage fit for a Rinehardt production. One almost expects to look up and see "Oedipus Rec" being presented. With it there is both improved listening and improved lighting of the musicians.

While we are writing of improvements at Tanglewood this year we must not forget that the new superintendent of grounds has gilded the lily by distributing at the entrance and about the grounds boxes of some of the largest geraniums we have seen in a long time. It adds matertally to the beauty of the approach and of the grounds.

Saturday night's concert brought a matured and polished Lukas Foss to the platform in Bach's "Converto for Clavier in F Minor" and in the "Concerto for Clavier in D Minor, No. 1." Foss played with a delicacy and raptness that were revealing and gave the music the full and thundering force which it also called for. There were rich, ly deserved bursts of applause and many "bravos." In the two concerts for three claviers, one in "D Minor, No. 1" and the other in "C Major, No. 2," the three pianists gave some fine team playing and made it a memorable performance of Bach. The group of players for these first two week-ends of Bach and Mozart gave the fine performance one expects of them and added materially to success of the evening and of the other two concerts. Among soloists this year at the shed concerts will be Rudolf Serkin and Isaac Stern. Pierre Monteux will make his annual appearances in some of the con- certs. The annual trek of music - lovers from, it seems, just about everywhere has [illegible]

SECOND ANNUAL CONCERT GIVEN BY PRO MUSICA

Works of Baroque Composers Presented at Tanglewood

By WILLARD M. CLARK

TANGLEWOOD — The New York Pro Musica, one of the finest vocal and instrumental ensembles to be heard, made its second annual appearance here Wednesday night giving the second concert in the current chamber music series.

Interesting Program

Under the direction of the scholarly Noah Greenberg, the group presented a most interesting program taken from the works of Monteverdi and other Italian baroque composers.

Members of the ensemble are Betty Wilson and Bethany Beardslee, sopranos; Robert White, countertenor; Charles Bressler, tenor; Gordon Myers, baritone; Brayton Lewis, bass; Paul Ehrlich, baroque flute and recorder; Martha Blackman, bass viol; Bernard Krainis, recorders and Paul Maynard, harpsichordist.

As will be noted from the many functions of each member of the group, the Pro Musica's concert offered a rare opportunity to hear seldom-performed music by a variety of vocal and instrumental combinations. We were told some of the instruments used by the group date back to the time when the music was written, while others are expert reproductions of the originals.

Listening to this music, one does not think of the individual performer, rather one's attention is on the ensemble, and what an ensemble this is. Every voice is beautiful and flexible, each able to provide myriad colorations. It was evident that these were dedicated musicians who find in ancient music a wonderful musical response.

Monteverdi stands in a world alone, for in his madrigals, operas and sacred works, he aroused music from conventionalism and inspired it to bold contrasts, declamative goals and multicolored sonorities.

We found particular pleasure in an exquisite duet for two sopranos, "Lamento Della Ninfa" and a fine duet for bass and baritone, "Ardo E. Scoprir." Then there was the more familiar "Lamento d'Arianna" in which each singer brought his or her own vocal color and merged it into a stunning fabric. Much of the music was accompanied by harpsichord and viol. Miss Blackman and Mr. Maynard joined forces in an interesting work by Biagio Marini, "Romances." The viol had a lovely mellow tone and blended well with the harpsichord.

Fine Talent

Mr. Maynard revealed his fine talent in a harpsichord solo by Frescobaldi and Bernard Krainis revealed the possibilities of the recorder in a sonata by Veracini. Where else would one have the opportunities to hear this music except from dedicated musicians like those of the New York Pro Musica? It is safe to predict, that having visited Tanglewood twice they will return again and again. They will be welcome.

Next Wednesday night the chamber music concert will be played by the Beaux Arts Trio of New York, one of the favorite visitors to Tanglewood. Its members are Menahem Pressler, piano; Daniel Guilet, violin, and Bernard Greenhouse, cello.

The week end concerts will be devoted to the music of Mozart, culminating Sunday afternoon with a performance of his "Requiem in D Minor." Soloists will be Adele Addison, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; Blake Stern, tenor and Donald Gramm, bass. The concert will open with the "Prague Symphony."

Music Review

New York Pro Musica at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE SECOND event in the Wednesday evening series of chamber music concerts at Tanglewood was a program last night in the Theater-Concert Hall by the New York Pro Musica, Noah Greenberg, director. They devoted the entire evening to composers of the Italian Baroque period, concentrating essentially on the great Claudio Monteverdi.

The Pro Musica programs are always the result of serious scholarships but the performances, expertly and carefully prepared, have a spirit of freshness and the fun of music-making. Thus their audiences are treated to as authentic a revival of the manner of this three-century old music as would be currently possible.

THE ENSEMBLE consists of six vocalists, Betty Wilson and Bethany Beardslee, sopranos, Robert White, countertenor, Charles Bressler, tenor, Gordon Myers, baritone, and Brayton Lewis, bass. The instrumentalists are Paul Ehrlich, Baroque flute and recorder. Martha Blackman, bas viol, Bernard Krainis, recorders, and Paul Maynard, harpsichord. Miss Blackman uses a 17th-century bow which has a concave stick and she holds it in the manner utilized in its day with thumb on top. She completes the picture by using no vibrato when playing the six-stringed instrument, held off the floor and steadied between the knees.

EXCEPT FOR Veracini, a contemporary of Bach, all the music of the evening was of the preceding century, mainly of Monteverdi, with examples by Biagio Marini and Frescobaldi. Monteverdi was the outstanding composer of his day and one of those whose genius definitely altered the course of musical history. He spent the last 30 years of his life as master of the choirs at St. Mark's in Venice, but his effect on music was in secular fields far more than within ecclesiastical limits.

It would not be evident to the general listener that so much research had gone into the preparation of a program such as last night's, but contemporary musicians have to reckon with notation as practiced in Monteverdi's time, with the realization of the accompaniment which was usually only a figured bass, with ornaments and embellishments, etc. There was a minimum of written indications which through the years permitted an abuse of interpretation. Greenberg always held to the original purity so far as was feasible.

THERE WAS great contrast and variety to the program. Everyone had a solo and the entire ensemble was variously grouped so that there was much chess-playing in the disposition of the performers after each number. The subject matter was more often gay and bubbling than sombre. The fact that the instruments do not permit of powerful accents or of stronger volume gives the whole evening a character far removed from that possible with the successors of the harpsichord and later stringed and wind instruments, but this specialized music has an enthusiastic public and last night they accorded the artists evidence of thorough appreciation.

Monteverdi's children and the succeeding generations strayed from the paths of music, but the reversion now of Noah Greenberg (whose immigrant father angelicized the name) to the family vocation is an atavistic phenomenon of remarkable interest. Greenberg conducts his decade of singers and instrumentalists with restrained but persuasive gestures and achieves consistently vital and graphic interpretations.

Sunday's all Mozart program will open with the Symphony No. 38 in D major, "Prague," K. 504. The remainder of the program will be devoted to a performance of Moazart's Requiem Mass in D minor, K 626.

Soloists will include Adele Addison, soprano; Florence Kopleff contralto; Blake Stern, tenor; and Donald Gramm, bass. The Festival Chorus will be prepared by Hugh Ross. The Mozart Requiem was last performed at Tanglewood in the summer of 1947 when the Berkshire Festival Chorus was conducted by Robert Shaw.

Music, Drama Notes

With every performance of its revival of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" sold out, the American Shakespeare Festival will add seven performances of the comedy to its repertoty schedule at Stratford, on August 11, 20, 27 and September 1 and 9, plus matinees August 16 and 30. These extra performances will be substituted for the dates previously assigned the other three plays in the current repertory: "Romeo and Juliet," "The Merry Wives of Windsor" and "All's Well That Ends Well." The theater management points out that this revised schedule now makes it possible to see all four productions in a two-day span during most weeks of the last half of the season.

The second weekend of concerts of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., will be devoted to the music of Mozart. Friday night's concert at 8:30, will feature the young French pianist, Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer as soloist in the Piano Concerto in G major, K. 453. Three Mozart symphonies are scheduled for Saturday evening's concert in the Music Shed, and Sunday afternoon at 2:30, Mozart's Requiem Mass in D minor, K. 626 will be performed with soloists, Adele Addison, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; Blake Stern, tenor and Donald Grann, bass. The Boston Symphony, Charles Munch conducting, will perform in all three concerts.

The thirtieth anniversary series of chamber music concerts at Music Mountain in Falls Village, also in its second week, will have harpsichordist Robert Conant and oboist Warren Stannard as guest artists with the Berkshire Quartet, Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock. Mr. Conant will appear with the Berkshire Quartet in Apotheose de Corelli for Harpsichord and Strings by Couperin and in the Concerto in F minor for Harpsichord and Strings, by Bach. Mr. Stannard will join members of the Quartet in the Quartet for Oboe and Strings by A. Cooke.

MOZART PROGRAM IS HELD IN LENOX

Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, French Pianist, Is Soloist —Munch Conducts

By ERIC SALZMAN
Special to The New York Times.

LENOX, Mass., July 10—The first of this week-end's Mozart programs at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood was held tonight in the Music Shed. Charles Munch led members of the Boston Symphony with Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, French pianist, as soloist.

The program was originally scheduled to take place in the smaller Theatre Concert Hall, which had been sold out. All-day rains made it impossible to accommodate people on the wet grass. They were seated inside the Shed instead.

Present in the audience were about two dozen managers of major American orchestras in Tanglewood for their annual meeting. They were guests of the Boston Symphony. The managers are discussing mutual problems and attending concerts today and tomorrow.

Miss Henriot-Schweitzer performed the Piano Concerto in G (K.453), an unusual and curious work. Its final movement is surely one of the most eccentric that Mozart ever wrote, with "singspiel" tunes, rough interjections and a long coda of empty flourishes.

The slow movement, one of the composer's genial quasi-improvisations, is more successful and was beautifully performed by the soloist. Her delicate touch and sensitive phrasing made it flow. She played the other movements with the same kind of musicality, but her limited range of dynamics and color was more evident.

The orchestra's contribution, both in the concerto and in the Overture to "Don Giovanni," the Divertimento in B flat (K.287) and the "Haffner" Symphony No. 35 (K.385), was notable for its vigor and bounce. There were a few roughnesses but plenty of forward motion, especially in the symphony.

In spite of the fact that the orchestra is a small one by modern symphony standards, Mr. Munch extracts an essentially big orchestra sound from the musicians. There is, of course, nothing wrong with this approach. Mozart himself was delighted when he could muster a few extra fiddles.

This impression was somewhat increased by the acoustics of the Shed and the new acoustical shell that has lately been installed there. These constructions were obviously designed for the larger orchestra. The shell is to be officially dedicated tomorrow.

MOZART WORKS HEARD BY CROWD AT TANGLEWOOD

Last Three Symphonies Presented; 'Requiem' Scheduled Today

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX—The second program of the Berkshire Festival week end devoted to the music of Mozart brought an audience estimated at 6929 persons to Tanglewood Saturday night to hear the last three symphonies, Nos. 39, 40 and 41.

With Charles Munch and his instrumentalists in fine form, the music was unfolded with all the art of which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is capable. Those used to the interpretations of Bruno Walter may have found reason to disagree with portions of the interpretations of Mr. Munch, but the French conductor's approach to Mozart is often more objective, if less subtle than Walter's. Whatever the difference, the audience Saturday night listened to some beautiful music-making.

Not Fancies of Moment

The last three symphonies by Mozart were not commissioned works and there is still speculation as to how they came to be written, since most of Mozart's musical output was written for a fee.

What we do know after listening to these three works is that Mozart, in these three symphonies, went far beyond the fulfillment of jobs and far beyond those boundaries which had heretofore bound him to the fancies of the moment.

The first of the three symphonies is in E flat and is the only one with an introduction. While this adagio introduction is serious, the music of all three symphonies is light-hearted.

"Jupiter" Heard

The G Minor Symphony is of a pervasive mood and style. This is strongly incisive music which is accomplished by deftness rather than massive means.

The final Symphony in C Major, known as the "Jupiter," was the culmination of Mozart's symphonic works. Within it are the familiar characteristics of sudden alternations of forcefulness and gentleness. The final movement is so smooth-flowing and apparently simple that one is content just to listen without wondering how this surface charm has been achieved.

We found Mr. Munch's interpretation of the G Minor Symphony most rewarding. It was performed with a wonderful spirit and an outer polish which was far more than veneer.

The program opened with the dedication of the new canopy given through the generosity of Mrs. Talbot in memory of her husband, the late Edmund Hawes Talbot, Boston lawyer and member of the firm of Tower, Talbot and Hiler. Mrs. Talbot's gift amounted to $40,000. Henry S. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, spoke briefly on the history of the original shell which had been in use for 25 years and is now superseded by the new Talbot canopy.

Gift Acknowledged

Charles Munch, speaking for himself and the orchestra thanked Mrs. Edna Betts Talbot for the gift which made the canopy possible and Mr. Cabot read the scroll which was given Mrs. Talbot by the board of trustees.

Sunday afternoon at 2.30 in the theater, Mr. Munch will conclude this Mozart series with a performance of the "Prague" Symphony and the "Requiem in D Minor." The Festival Chorus and following soloists will be heard, Adele Addison, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; Blake Stern, tenor; and Donald Gramm, bass.

Mozart Week End Opens At Festival in Tanglewood

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX — The first of three concerts devoted to the music of Mozart was given Friday night in the shed. Due to inclement weather the audience was much smaller than it otherwise would have been, numbering only 2687.

Much to Admire

There was much to admire during the course of the evening, with profound admiration due pianist Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer and concert-master Richard Burgin for their fantastic achievements.

The concert opened with a finely detailed performance of the overture to "Don Giovanni." Then followed a delectable performance of the Piano Concerto in G Major, K. 453, with Mme. Schweitzer as soloist. This is a friendly, compact concerto, composed not for himself but for a pupil, the daughter of one of his Salzburg friends. The performance was always within an intimate frame.

We have never heard Mme. Schweitzer play with greater expressivity or greater beauty of tone. This was particularly noticeable in the exquisite, sade andante, which in spite of a very deliberate tempo was intensely moving.

Ovation Given

The concluding movement was gay and boyant and with the horns, which heretofore had been mostly in a supporting role, having their fling. The performance and performers received a veritable ovation at the conclusion with bravos flying all over the house.

Incidentally, the new canopy vastly improves the sound projection.

Another lovely work on this program was the Divertimento in B Flat for strings and two horns. It was originally written for string quartet with two horns, the first violin having a true solo part. In this performance the four string parts were played by the string orchestra.

Depth of Detail

Mozart wrote four of his divertimenti for strings and horns. The Divertimento in B Flat is the most familiar today, probably because of the sustained solidity of its six movements and the depth of its expressive detail.

Mr. Munch and his players provided a performance of warmth, gaity and tenderness and the adagio, for strings only, will long linger in our ears. Mr. Burgin was at his superb best.

The final number was the Symphony No. 35 in D Minor, the "Haffner" Symphony. This was, as was so often the case, a commissioned work, which Mozart drew from other works. This is true party music. The minuet has its Old World elegance, the slow andante is sheer graciousness and the presto a veritable joy, so fast a pace being demanded that one wonders if the players of the day could possibly have met the demands.

Players Meet Demands

The Boston Symphony players had no difficulty at all in meeting all demands with a boyance and grace which held the attention and delighted the ear.

Tonight the orchestra, directed by Mr. Munch, will play the last three symphonies by Mozart, Nos. 39, 40 and 41. Sunday afternoon we shall hear the "Prague" Symphony and the "Requiem in D Minor." The soloists in the requiem will be Adele Addison, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; Blake Stern, tenor, and Donald Gramm, bass. We are told the house is completely sold out.

Dr. Munch to Dedicate Tanglewood Canopy

A new stage canopy in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will be officially dedicated tonight during intermission of the Saturday evening concert featuring three Mozart symphonies.

DR. CHARLES MUNCH, music director of the orchestra who will conduct the concert, will participate in dedication ceremonies as will Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, and Mrs. Edna Betts Talbot of Boston, donor of the canopy.

The Talbot canopy, which replaces the former shell built by the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Inc., and used for 25 years of the Berkshire Festival concerts, is the gift of Mrs. Talbot, who has given $40,000 to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a memorial to her husband, the late Edmund Hawes Talbot, Boston lawyer.

The canopy was designed by Eero Saarinen and Associates of Bloomfield Hills, Mich., architects, in co-operation with Bolt, Beranek and Newman Inc., acoustical consultants of Cambridge, Mass.

THE NEW CANOPY is suspended from the roof trusses by steel cable and consists of a series of triangular panels of graduated sizes conected tip-to-tip. The sidewalls of the stage are solid, with openings between each triangle and permit the audience seated within an arc of 110 degrees to see the orchestra. Architecturally the sidewalls are integrated with the floating overhead panels and repeat the triangular motif.

The second weekend of programs at Tanglewood, featuring music of Mozart, opened last night in the theater-concert hall. Dr. Munch will conduct the programs tonight at 8:30 p.m. and Sunday at 2:30 p.m.

Tonight's program will include the symphonies "number 39 in E flat major, K.543;" "number 40 in G minor, K.550" and "number 41 in C major, 'Jupiter' K.551."

The program tomorrow afternoon will include the symphony "number 38 in D major, 'Prague' K.504;" and the "Requiem Mass in D minor, K.626."

Music Review

Mozart at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE SECOND WEEK of Tanglewood concerts started last night with a program of Mozart played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra lead by Charles Munch. As has been the custom for many years, the entire second weekend will be devoted to the music of the Salzburg genius. An orchestra of approximately 35 men takes part, probably the size of the orchestra used in the 18th century.

This concert had been scheduled for the theater-concert hall, but the threat of rain, which never materialized, prompted moving to the great Shed where all the overflow which otherwise would have been distributed about on the surrounding lawns of the theater would be under the protective roof of the larger auditorium.

IN ADDITION to the new stage background and acoustic canopy, a small portable reflecting shell was used last night for the first time with favorable effects. The improvements in appearance and sound projection would seem to be decided successes, and the new lighting is striking as well as, no doubt, efficient.

Having made the happy decision to concentrate on Mozart for this stage of the Berkshire Festival, those responsible for the selection of the programs are in clover, so to speak, and in an embarrassment of riches. They can not turn in any direction but to find a rich harvest, yet the list last night was conspicuously felicitous both in performance and insofar as Mozart's contribution was concerned.

THE CONCLUDING symphony was the D major "Haffner," written on commission of the Salzburg burgermeister and played with scintillating zest. Munch played it "con" more "spirito" than Mozart may have either asked or expected, but he may well have been inveigled into the rarified strata of brilliance by the orchestra's exceptional wizardry of the evening.

Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer

They responded to their director's near-excessive demands with gleeful sparkle and the magic of the symphony score never was more apparent.

The B flat divertimento for strings and two horns overflows with lovely invention, and each of the six movements is a gem. The first violins covered themselves with glory in the recitative before the final allegro. According to John N. Burk in his new book, "Mozart and His Music," this was originally played by a solo quartet but last night the whole first violin section, from the domination of Concertmaster Richard Burgin right through to the last desk, played with a distinction that was as eloquent as it was masterful.

NICOLE Henriot - Schweitzer was the soloist in the G major piano concerto. Nowhere in Mozart's output is the progress in musical form more visible than in his concerti for keyboard. In the concerti of Bach played last week, one could observe how the orchestral tutti were handled and how often the piano joined in and only emerged when the accompaniment halted or diminished. Mozart really writes a symphony for the orchestra in his piano concerti and their new importance and development within the short period of a half-century creates a complete new and advanced conception of relationship. True, he always has unlimited inspiration at his fingertips, but its manipulation is the wonder of it all. The soloist could have deepened the impression he made by giving more shape and inflection to the simple utterances Mozart allots her.

The program opened with a vigorous overture to "Don Giovanni."

Mozart Series At Tanglewood

Friday night's concert in this year's Mozart series at Tanglewood brought the Don Giovanni Overture, the Piano Concerto in G Major (K. 453), the Divertimento in B flat major (K. 287) and the Haffner Symphony. Charles Munch conducted players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer was the soloist in the Concerto. On her credit side she has a fleet technique and her touch was appropriately light for this concerto, but to some ears Mozart sounds better with a more even tempo than she favored Friday. A shortage of rehearsal time betrayed itself not only in several ragged orchestral passages, but also in a lack of rapport among soloist, conductor and orchestra.

Perhaps it was also a shortage of rehearsal time which made Mr. Munch's approach to the Divertimento seem tentative. It is scored for strings and 2 horns, and to my taste the horns should have been a more prominent part of the ensemble.

The best playing of the evening was brought to the Haffner Symphony. The final movement went at an unusually brisk pace, but the players in the orchestra followed Mr. Munch's lead like the virtuosos they are.

Due to a light rain the concert was moved from the theatre to the shed. The new sound canopy there proves a welcome contrast to the microphones and loudspeakers at other Summer festivals, but a check of several locations during the concert showed that it is most effective in the center of the seating area.

SHELL DEDICATED AT TANGLEWOOD

New $50,000 Acoustical Canopy in Official Bow—Mozart Programs Given

By ERIC SALZMAN
Special to The New York Times.

LENOX, Mass., July 12—The striking new acoustical shell in the Music Shed here in Tanglewood was dedicated last night imediately preceding a program of Mozart symphonies. The shell, officially referred to as the Talbot Canopy, was named for Mrs. Edna Betts Talbot of Boston, who gave $40,000 toward the cost of the new construction. The other $10,000 needed for the work had been donated by Charles Munch, comusical director of the Boston Symphony several years ago.

At that time, it was feared that the old shell, which antedated the Shed itself, might fall apart at any time. Eero Saarinen and Associates of Bloomfield, Mich., architects, and Bolt, Beranek & Newman, Inc., acoustical consultants of Cambridge, designed a replacement that could not be built until Mrs. Talbot made her generous donation.

The concert, which consisted of the last three symphonies of Mozart, was actually the third program to be performed in the new shell. One of the Bach programs last week was held in the Shed and Friday night's concert was moved to the Shed from the Theatre-Concert Hall following heavy rains.

Rear Walls Serrated

The serrated rear walls of the shell and the series of triangular panels suspended from the roof trusses are designed to spread the sound of all the members of the orchestra evenly around the entire listening area, which includes the great lawn in back.

Although not different in quality from before, the new sound does bring the winds forward and is evenly distributed all around. The quite lively acoustics will probably be even more welcome in the big orchestra concerts that begin next week.

The comparatively small size of the orchestra did not prevent Dr. Munch from performing the Mozart symphonies on a big scale. The Symphony No. 40 in G minor was expressively phrased and the "Jupiter" had power and drive. With one exception, the last movement of the E-flat Symphony No. 39, everything was on the brisk side. Since the orchestra was in excelent form there was a considerable gain in excitement.

Dr. Munch's tendency to alter tempos for expressive purposes was occasionally disturbing however. An annoying trick was to speed up a slow movement melody during its course. It seemed like an artificial way of getting across the span of a long-arched phrase that should have ben sustained through its own inner tension.

'Prague' Symphony Heard

Another Mozart symphony, the "Prague," No. 38, performed in much the same vigorous fashion as the others, opened this afternoon's theatre-concert hall program, which featured a performance of the Mazart-Sussmayr Requiem Mass. Curiously enough, the biggest work of the week-end was on the only concert performed in the smaller building.

The work gave Dr. Munch an opportunity to demonstrate his gift for a dramatic performance even within cramped quarters and in spite of the dry, grainy acoustics of the building. There were some extreme tempos, striking dynamic and tempo changes and plenty of intensity.

The soloists, Adele Addison, coprano, Florence Kopleff, contralto, Blake Stern, tenor, and Donald Gramm, bass, were excellent, particularly in the soft passages, and worked beautifully together. The Festival Chorus, Hugh Ross, director, and the orchestra were not always absolutely smooth but they were strong and expressive.

Attendance for the weekend totaled 13,747. There were 2,687 who braved the wet weather on Friday, 6,929 last night and 4,131 this afternoon.

Festival Enhanced By Fromm Group

By ROBERT TAYLOR

The activities of the Fromm Music Foundation provide one of the stimulating aspects of the current Berkshire Festival scene. The Foundation, devoted to the development of contemporary music, "aims to return the initiative to the composer and to strengthen the most vital source of a healthy musical culture: composition." It also deserves recognition for pioneer work.

Tomorrow night, for example, in the Theater - Concert Hall at Tanglewood, the Fromm Foundation plans to offer a concert with players largely drawn from the Boston Symphony. Once could scarcely anticipate a more adventuresome bill: Prokofieff's Sonata for Flute and Piano; a 1957 quartet written by Ingolf Dahl; Leos Janacek's "Diary of One Who Vanished—for tenor, alto, trio of women's voices and piano," and the premiere of Arnold Franchetti's "Three Ricercari for 15 Instruments," commissioned by the Foundation and composed last year.

One assumes—if only from a title like "Three Ricercari"—the program will make severe intellectual demands on the audience. Whether the result justifies the effort is a separate consideration: but the Foundation has certainly done everything to fulfill its aims, by giving new music a hearing.

Coterie Audience

There's a school of criticism that holds contemporary music of certain kinds—the apprentice work of young professional composers, say—should be isolated in the conservatory and the musical laboratory rather than inflicted on concert-goers. Perhaps so. We have a glut of ephemeral, academic, fundamentally experimental scores.

On the other hand, the process of creativity works two ways—requiring a creative audience as well as creative artists. This particular audience, in my estimation, ought to be willing to put up with disappointment, even outrage, for the sake of the rare and infrequent talent. It is a minority audience, one that sets a standard, enables the process of creation to occur.

The Fromm Foundation helps to assemble such a public. The unfortunate aspects are, of course, that the coterie audience emphasizes the schism between the composer and the public at large. But the positive aspects probably outweigh this: at a time when all the arts have tended to estrange the artist from his audience, such a minority has encouraged the artist to compose. Under the circumstances it's no small contribution. Even the most sterile of composers needs to be heard.

MOZART PROGRAM IS HELD IN LENOX

By ERIC SALZMAN
Special to The New York Times.

LENOX, Mass., July 10—The first of this week-end's Mozart programs at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood was held Friday in the Music Shed. Charles Munch led members of the Boston Symphony with Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, French pianist, as soloist.

The program was originally scheduled to take place in the smaller Theatre Concert Hall, which had been sold out. All-day rains made it impossible to accommodate people on the wet grass. They were seated inside the Shed instead.

Present in the audience were about two dozen managers of major American orchestras in Tanglewood for their annual meeting. They were guests of the Boston Symphony. The managers are discussing mutual problems and attending concerts today and tomorrow.

Miss Henriot-Schweitzer performed the Piano Concerto in G (K.453), an unusual and curious work. Its final movement is surely one of the most eccentric that Mozart ever wrote, with "singspiel" tunes, rough interjections and a long coda of empty flourishes.

The slow movement, one of the composer's genial quasi-improvisations, is more successful and was beautifully performed by the soloist. Her delicate touch and sensitive phrasing made it flow. She played the other movements with the same kind of musicality, but her limited range of dynamics and color was more evident.

The orchestra's contribution, both in the concerto and in the Overture to "Don Giovanni," the Divertimento in B flat (K.287), and the "Haffner" Symphony No. 35 (K.385), was notable for its vigor and bounce. There were a few roughnesses but plenty of forward motion, especially in the symphony.

In spite of the fact that the orchestra is a small one by modern symphony standards, Mr. Munch extracts an essentially big orchestra sound from the musicians. There is, of course, nothing wrong with this approach. Mozart himself was delighted when he could muster a few extra fiddles.

This impression was somewhat increased by the acoustics of the Shed and the new acoustical shell that has lately been installed there. These constructions were obviously designed for the larger orchestra. The shell is to be officially dedicated Saturday.

Mozart Concerts At Tanglewood Drew 13,000 Over The Weekend

A weekend of Mozart concerts drew more than 13,000 people to Tanglewood in Lenox Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon.

This was the second weekend of the Berkshire Festival, the first being devoted to the works of Bach.

Next weekend the Festival will move into the big Music Shed and the full Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard.

A smaller orchestra, predominantly strings, is used for Mozart.

Because of bad weather the Friday night concert was moved from the Theatre-Concert Hall to the Music Shed and one could hear the new Talbot canopy, to be dedicated this weekend, in action. Though it looks something like a homeward flight of bats, the canopy does improve acoustics, which is its purpose.

Mme. Henriot-Schweitzer "A Joy"

This was especially important Friday night when Mme. Henriot-Schweitzer played Mozart's Piano Concert in G Major with the orchestra, directed by Charles Munch.

This young artist's technique is breathtaking to watch and a joy to hear, it is so meticulous.

The touch is light and sure, with an elegance entirely suited to Mozart, but on occasion it was hard to hear against the orchestra. The Andante was especially beautiful.

Mme. Henriot-Schweitzer received a real ovation for her performance.

The program opened with the overture to "Don Giovanni," and included also Divertimento in B flat major, and the "Haffner" Symphony.

It was an interesting program, showing Mozart's colorful side as well as the lyric style that is so appealing. It was easy to see why these smaller concerts of the Bach-Mozart series are so popular at Tanglewood. They attract larger and larger audiences each year, mostly of young people.

Saturday night Charles Munch conducted a program consisting of Symphonies No. 39, 40, and 41. On Sunday afternoon more than 4000 were on hand to hear him lead the orchestra in the "Prague" Symphony, and the Requiem Mass in D Minor. Soloists were Adele Addison, Florence Kopleff, Blake Stern, and Donald Gramm.

While the full orchestra of the Boston Symphony has peerless grandeur, the Mozart group, without the brasses, offers a delightful way to hear the famous "Boston strings".

It is an unusual musical experience to hear programs such as these Mozart concerts, one full of unanticipated pleasures and surprisingly devoid of sameness.

This Wednesday the Beaux Arts Trio will give a Chamber Music concert at Tanglewood.

Friday night the big shed concerts begin.

Programs to Come

Next Friday and Saturday evenings (July 17-18) at 8.30 and next Sunday afternoon at 2.30 the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the first of four weekends of Berkshire Festival concerts by the full orchestra in the Music Shed. Concerts will be conducted by Charles Munch, music director of the Orchestra, and Pierre Monteux, conductor emeritus. Soloists will include Issac Stern, violin and Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, piano, and Lukas Foss will conduct a performance of his new work "Symphony of Chorales" on Saturday evening.

At the concert on Friday, July 17, Charles Munch will present Berlioz' "Corsair" Overture, "Parables" by Bohuslav Martinu and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony. "Parables" was commissioned by Dr. Munch and dedicated to him and received its first performance under his direction in Boston during the past season. The three movements are titled: I. The Parable of a Sculpture; II. The Parable of a Garden; and III. The Parable of a Labyrinth.

Dr. Munch will conduct the concert of Saturday evening, opening the program with the "Oberon" Overture by Weber. Lukas Foss will then conduct a performance of his own work, "Symphony of Chorales." The work, based on four chorale texts, was first performed by the Pittsburgh Symphony on Oct. 24, 1958, and it was performed in Boston under the composer's direction and later by the New York Philharmonic. The program will conclude with Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto. The soloist, Isaac Stern, will make the first of three Berkshire Festival appearances this season. He will also appear on Friday, July 24 and Sunday, August 2.

Pierre Monteux

Pierre Monteux will make his first guest appearance at the Festival next Sunday afternoon. His program will include the Introduction and Wedding March from the opera, "Coq d' Or" by Rimsky - Korsakov, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," the Symphony on a French Mountain Air by D'Indy, with Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer as piano soloist, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. This concert, sponsored by the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, Paul Fromm, president, is open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center as are the student concerts and lectures of the School. A concert will be presented by the Tanglewood Choir on Tuesday, July 14, at 8.30 p. m. in the Theater. The student orhestra will perform in the Music Shed on Thursday, July 16, at 8.30, and a student chamber music performance will be presented in the Chamber Music Hall on Sunday morning, July 19 at 10 a. m. as well as this morning (July 12). Music Review

Mozart Finale at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE CONCERT in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon completed the second weekend of the Berkshire Festival. The next four weeks will be played by the large and complete Boston Symphony Orchestra, part of which had still been playing the "Esplanade" concerts in Boston. All the remaining programs will be played in the great Shed.

Charles Munch, directing an orchestra of chamber size, in an all-Mozart program, to whom the three concerts of the weekend had been devoted, gave some of the most felicitous readings he has achieved in his 10 years at the head of the famous orchestra. His Mozart was spacious and poised and the orchestra's performances were at the top of their unique potentiality.

YESTERDAY afternoon there was the D major symphony, known as the "Prague," and the Requiem Mass. On Saturday evening there had been the last three symphonies, numbers 39, 40, and 41, which Mozart had written in the short, concentrated six weeks of the summer of 1788. Mozart wrote so much for certain patrons or for certain ocassions and always had to take into account the forces available to execute the music. Thus there is rarely any duplication in the instrumentation of the symphonies. For instance, there were no clarinets in the Salzburg orchestra. "How I envy the Mannheim clarinets," he once exclaimed. But in these final symphonies he for once wrote evidently from pure inspiration and without immediate purpose.

He stuck to a plan here which included two shorter movements within the frame of the outer allegros, and which consisted of a slow melody and a more sprightly minuet. It was on this formula that Beethoven later built, but he substituted a spirited scherzo for the minuet.

Florence Kopleff

ONE MAY HAVE questioned the wisdom of listing three such similar symphonies on one program but any such doubts were dispelled by the performance. Munch realized the tremendous variety and contrasts Mozart built into his immortal structures, even though in each edifice he used more or less the same scaffolding. Munch went much deeper than the superficial pleasing melodies and effective harmonies conjured up so easily and so readily, and gave each its proper and more profound character.

Yesterday afternoon the "Prague" symphony received the same attentive playing although the andante was slow in getting established firmly. The Requiem, Mozart's last effort, enlisted Adele Addison, soprano, Florence Kopleff, contralto, Blake Stern, tenor, and Donald Gramm, bass, as soloists, and the 50-voiced Festival chorus, of which Hugh Ross is the director. There is little opportunity for the soloists individually, but they have many assignments as an ensemble and they proved to be excellently adjusted as well as artistically considerate.

The chorus responded to Munch's incisive direction with instantaneous reflection and retained vigor in his more restrained demands as fully as in his calls for complete release. The support of the organ added depth and splendor to the total tonal picture and brought the Mozart section of the Festival to a glorious close.

Major Concerts in Music Shed Open Friday for 4 Weekends

TANGLEWOOD — The Mozart series of concerts held here over the weekend with Dr. Charles Munch conducting the small Boston Symphony Orchestra drew 13,747 persons. The largest crowd, 6,929, turned out Saturday night in the Music Shed when the new stage canopy, donated by Mrs. Edna Betts Talbot of Boston was dedicated. On Friday 2,687 attended the concert held in the theater-concert hall and yesterday afternoon a crowd of 4,131 filled the theater-concert hall and spread out over the spacious lawns around the small auditorium.

Fromm Concert Tonight

Tonight at 8:30 a special concert of contemporary chamber music will be performed by members of the BSO with assisting artist, pianist Jesus Maria Sanroma in the theater-concert hall. This concert, sponsored by the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, is open to the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center as are the student concerts and lectures of the school. The Tanglewood choir will give a concert tomorrow night at 8:30 in the theater. The student orchestra will perform in the Music Shed Thursday night at 8:30 and a student chamber music performance will be given in the chamber music hall Sunday morning at 10. Two lectures in the chamber music hall will also be open to Friends.

On Friday at 3:15 the third lecture in the "Seminar in Contemporary Music" will be given also by Mr. Foss. Musical selections will be performed by Fromm Foundation players.

The major concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra will open Friday at the first Berkshire Nights series when Dr. Munch will conduct works by Berlioz, Martinu and Tchaikovsky. This concert and the other weekend performances will be held in the Music Shed. Saturday night Dr. Munch will conduct works by Weber, Foss and Tchaikovsky. The feature soloist will be the famed violinist, Isaac Stern.

Small Group Performs In Music Shed

(Special to The American)

LENOX, MASS. — The Mozart series of concerts at Tanglewood during the second week of the six-week Berkshire Festival brought large audiences for the intimate concerts usually given in the theater-concert hall. Friday night's concert, moved to the large shed because of the rain in order that the audience might not have to sit on the lawn, presented Nicole Henriot - Schweitzer as piano soloist in a fine performance which would have been more at home in the original theater - concert hall with its more intimate feeling.

Though the program was a good one and well performed we had the feeling that it was not really for the huge music shed, designed for the larger audience of the last four weeks of the Berkshire Festival. Miss Henriot - Schweitzer received an ovation from the 2,700 who seemed to appreciate the performance with its music that really flowed in the "Piano Concerto in G Major." Despite the damp weather the string section was in fine form and the orchestra also received an ovation.

Charles Munch conducted the three concerts with Hugh Ross directing the Festival Chorus in yesterday's performance of the "Requiem Mass, in D Minor." The other Sunday selection was the "Prague," "No. 38, in D Major." The concert Saturday night was held in the shed and presented Mozart's "Symphony No. 39." his "Symphony No. 40," and the famous "Jupiter."

During intermission Saturday night the new Edmund Hawes Talbot canopy over the orchestra was dedicated. Replacing the old shell used for some 25 years it is a big improvement in many ways. Friday night we checked the acoustics with this new canopy trying the listening qualities of the shed and the area back of it in more than a dozen locations. This reporter's view is that listening pleasure will be considerably improved for all those toward the rear of the shed and way back out on the lawns. The final tests, however, must wait until we have a chance to hear the full complement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with a full audience of some 6,000 in the shed with 6 to 10 thousand more on the lawns. This will be possible at the end of the week when the Music Shed concerts begin on Friday night.

Lecture Concerts

The Fromm Foundation is also sponsoring a series of lecture-concerts at Tanglewood, entitled seminar in contemporary music, with special emphasis on aspects of new music. The lectures, on Friday afternoons at 3.15 in the Chamber Music Hall, are open to friends of the Music Center and the first lecture was given on July 3 by Leon Kirchner, who spoke on Materials of Musical Composition. Mr. Kirchner's String Quartet No. 2 (composed in 1958) was performed by Fromm Fellowship players.

Succeeding lecture-concerts will be as follows: Hugh Ross will be the speaker on Friday on "Phases of Contemporary Choral Literature," and his lecture will be illustrated with Stravinsky's Mass (1943) and the Nonet (1923) by Heitor Villa-lobos. On the 24th Gunther Schuller will speak on his own compositions, two of which—the String Quartet (1957), commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation, and the Wind Quintet (1958)—will be performed. Robert Craft will lecture on the 31st on "New Music and Performance Problems" and will illustrate his lecture with works by Luigi Dallapiccola ("Goethe Lieder," 1953) and Alban Berg (Chamber Concerto for piano, violin and wind instruments, 1925). The final talk will be presented on Aug. 7 by Ernst Krenek. Compositions by Mr. Krenek to be performed will include Sechs Vermessene, for piano (1958); Pentagram, for Wind Quintet (1957); and String Quartet No. 6 (1936).

Fromm Foundation

The Fromm Music Foundation is dedicated to the furtherance of contemporary music. Wishing to bring the living flow of musical creation closer to the public, the foundation aims to return the initiative to the composer and to strengthen the most vital source of a healthy musical culture: composition. To foster the realization of this aim, the foundation commissions new works, awards prizes for existing works, and sponsors the study, performance, publication and recording of contemporary music. The foundation is headed by Paul Fromm of Chicago, its founder and president, and Alexander Schnieder, its associate director. The Fromm Music Foundation program at Tanglewood was begun in 1956.

Munch Gift of $10,000 Aids Tanglewood

By BOB HECOX
Gazette Reporter

A capacity audience at the Tanglewood music shed Saturday night learned from a surprise announcement that Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor Charles Munch had donated $10,000 toward the cost of the new Edmund Hawes Talbot canopy installed this season for Berkshire musical festivals.

Bulk of the construction cost of the canopy, which replaces the former shell used for 25 years at the concerts, was given by Edna Betts Talbot, Boston. Her $40,000 donation was as a memorial to her husband, the late Edmund Hawes Talbot.

During the brief dedication ceremony, which preceded an all-Mozart concert, Munch thanked Mrs. Talbot on his own and his orchestra's behalf for the gift of the canopy which he said had solved the acoustical problems of the shed and made it an increased joy for them, as musicians, to play at Tanglewood.

Mrs. Talbot was given a memorial album by orchestra officials who lauded her faithful attendance at concerts there over a period of 62 years.

The increased perfection of sound under the new canopy was made apparent by several inveterate concert-goers who expressed their new listening enjoyment to this reporter. A Berlin, Germany, woman said she had never heard its equal but would "like a rear seat when Wagner's music is played because it would be overpowering under this new arrangement."

Mozart Weekend at Tanglewood

Munch Conducts Symphonies and Requiem

By Robert W. Dumm

Lenox, Mass.

Charles Munch's concerts with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood this weekend were devoted to Mozart. Saturday evening he conducted the "Great Three," the Symphonies in E flat major (K. 543), in G minor (K. 550), and in C major (K. 551), the "Jupiter." Sunday brought the shorter "Prague" Symphony, and the magnificent Requiem Mass in D minor (K. 626), about which more later. First, however, the symphonies:

Again one wants to praise the magic of the Boston Symphony's special blend, yet the pen pauses. By all reason, the connoisseur should be reposing in full appeasement, yet he frets a bit.

Was it the humidity, or the delicately probing mosquitoes, or the unequal competition of anything man-made alongside the beauty of the mountains? Why did the heart stay persistently disengaged, and why does the pen perversely write its praise in a crabbed backhand?

But the ears are hard to deceive, even when the senses are lulled by the beauties of nature, and the mind kept asking its wakeful questions. Perhaps it all had to do with the new canopy for the orchestra—a handsome one, by the way, given by Mrs. Edmund Talbot of Boston in memory of her husband. It was formally accepted in a tasteful and touching speech by Dr. Munch. Designed by the Saarinens of Detroit, it is a fascinating maze of triangles shaped toward a vanishing point.

An absorbed interest in the new possibilities for practical pianissimos seemed to draw both conductor and players into attitudes of listening to themselves, as if they were all probing a strange cave with radar signals. On the whole, the winds signaled better than the strings, producing prodigies of electrosonic blend in the slow movements. In these moments, Dr. Munch would slow them just enough to permit us to marvel. When the acoustic preoccupation got beyond Mozart, the sense gave way to sound.

But sense often gives way to sound in poetry, and this is a very poetic brand of Mozart. True, there was a dazzlement, even a puckishness, in the finales, and a comet of a finish for the "Jupiter"; but one felt the stirring places to be better intended than sustained, and the giddier phrases to rise, but without laughing gas. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, from her flute section, kept showing the way, piping her saucy salvos, but no one seemed to listen.

On Sunday things were different at the Theater-Concert Hall. There we were treated to a genuine re-creation of the Requiem Mass, Mozart's sweetly triumphant swansong to music. Covered by a wooden roof, and closer to the musicians, one felt more a participant, and the truant heart was led back to its commitment to music.

The superlative turns come easily to mind: the smilingly assured singing of the Festival Chorus, trained by Hugh Ross; the wild, phantasmagoric pitching of the Dies Irae, and the sensitively blended quartet singing the Recordare. Indeed, the four soloists everywhere seemed to sing better in ensemble than in solo, the reverse of the usual case.

Florence Kopleff and Donald Gramm, the contralto and bass, were remarkable for their smoothly spun-out tones; while Blake Stern, the tenor, tended to gulp his beginnings and swallow his endings. Adele Addison, the soprano, usually so notable for a skylarking penetration of sound, seemed a little tired.

Yet on the whole, all forces rallied and carried the day for their leader, and small wonder, for Dr. Munch had never seemed so young nor so vigorous.

MOZART SERIES ENDS AT LENOX, 4131 ATTENDING

'Prague Symphony,' 'Requiem in D Minor' Closes Three Concerts

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX—A series of concerts devoted to the music of Mozart concluded Sunday afternoon with performances of the "Prague Symphony" and the "Requiem in D Minor" both conducted by Charles Munch. The series has been successful both artistically and audience-wise with an estimated 13,847 persons attending the three concerts. An audience of 4131 was present Sunday afternoon and conditions were ideal for outdoor listening.

Rare Moments

There have been some rare moments during these concerts. One remembers the expressive pleasure of Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer in the "Piano Concerto in G Major"; the buoyant and brilliant performance of the "Divertimenti in B Flat, for strings and two horns"; the expressive, clean-cut performance of the "Symphony in G Major, No. 40," and, above all the supreme beauty of the requiem.

Mr. Munch had splendid resources for a full communication of the requiem. The festival chorus is now in the groove and such movements as the Kyrie and Dies Irae were sung with full tone, clean articulation and excellent projection. The soloists were all veterans of the Berkshire Festival. Adele Addison, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; Blake Stern, tenor, and Donald Gramm does whatever Stern lacked full qualifications to fill the demands of Mozart. Miss Addison, in glorious voice, and Miss Kopleff's luscious voice were particularly rewarding and Donald Gramm does whatever he has to do in fine musical fashion. The small theater was ideal for the intimate and very personal utterance given the requiem. Mr. Munch saw that the work was well paced and he was aware of the soloists.

Five Symphonies

The program opened with the "Prague Symphony." During the three concerts five symphonies were heard. In fact, the concert Saturday night devoted to three symphonies drew the largest single audience, estimated at 6929. Mr. Munch's approach to the symphonies is real stic but always elegant and meticulously detailed. Their were exquisite phrasing in the andante movement of the "Prague" and Doriot Dwyer's flute sang soulfully in the finale. Mr. Munch lets the music speak for itself which it is fully capable of doing.

One of the most interesting concerts of the chamber music series will be given Wednesday night by the Beaux Arts Trio of New York. Messers Pressler, Istomin and Greenhouse have been together long enough to have achieved a real unity and mutuality of thought, so necessary for the perfect ensemble. Each is master of his instrument. The program will include trios by Mozart, Saint-Saens, Beethoven and Copland. The full Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on hand Friday night, inaugurating the shed concerts. Mr. Munch will conduct the overture to the "Corsair" by Berlioz, "Parable" by Martinu, a work commissioned by the orchestra, and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6.

Perfectly Balanced Program Is Enjoyed At Tanglewood

The three last and peerless symphonies of the prolific Mozart written (awesome to contemplate) in June, July and August of 1788, within a period of seven weeks, (and these were not the only compositions), gave the 6029 listeners a rare opportunity to enjoy these marvellously contrasting works.

From the solemn, slow introduction of the E flat major No. 39, favorite of Italians for its exquisite airs and lyric mood; (which Rossini incorporated in "The Barber of Seville"), containing that breathtakingly artful andante, some capricious modulations in the final movement, next the G minor No. 40, lucid, restless and poignant, to the final C major No. 41 and its intricate counterpunctal last movement, Dr. Munch directed with a classic restraint and with confidence in his musicians to delineate the amazing structure of this triptych of symphonies. A few moments when the winds obliterated the beat of the strings, and when playing became routine did not detract from one's absorption in contemplating a true expression of genius.

Ever since Henry Hadley first brought the New York Symphony to play near Tanglewood under the stars, to be succeeded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky through the perseverance of Gertrude Robinson-Smith, there have always been problems to be surmounted for the enjoyment of the many devoted participants in the Berkshire Festival.

Before the program on Saturday evening Henry Cabot, president of the Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presented a testimonial to a gracious and elderly lady, Edna Betts Talbot of Boston, commemorating her generous gift of $40,000 for the cost of construction of the new acoustical canopy in the Shed, in memory of her late husband, Edmund Hawes Talbot. Dr. Munch also took part, expressing his thanks and saluting Mrs. Talbot for helping to solve the problem of proportion between the different elements of the orchestra, joining with Mr. Cabot in deepest gratitude for her generosity and thoughtfulness.

Sunday's program in the theatre-concert hall brought 4131 eager music-lovers to hear a perfectly balanced performance of Mozart's "Prague" Symphony No. 38 in D major. The second half of the program was executed by the Festival Chorus, trained by Hugh Ross, and conducted by Dr. Munch, with assisting soloists, Adele Addison soprano, Florence Kopleff, contralto, Blake Stern, tenor and Donald Gramm, bass, in the Requiem Mass in D minor. Finished by Franz Xaver Sussmayer after Mozart's death left the Mass incomplete, it is a moving and complex work, and was directed and performed with simple dignity and religious intensity. The timbre of the solo singers' voices blended with that of the instruments to produce a pleasurable quality; the chorus' diction was well understood, and could have been more rounded, their attacks were clean, and when all were united the beauty of the sound caused even the birds to join in with grand abandon, so that their song was heard during the sharp silences.

In spite of the heavy humidity, the gratified audience lingered long to applaud their enjoyment and appreciation.

Next week will see the opening of the four weekends of Berkshire Festival concerts by the full orchestra in the music shed.

Mozart Program Dedicates Canopy

By PETER B. TAUB

Knickerbocker News Staff Writer

The striking new canopy that seems to float through the Music Shed at Tanglewood was dedicated Saturday night at a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert consisting of Mozart's last three symphonies—the 39th, 40th and 41st.

The gray and black canopy was designed by Eero Saarinen. Made up of a series of triangles, it looks liks a swarm of butterflies or modernistic airplanes in flight. The butterflies (or airplanes), which are suspended from the roof supports, start part way out over the audience and appear to be following their leader as they fly toward the rear of the stage.

The optical effect varies, depending on where you sit, but it is fascinating, regardless.

IN A WAY, the canopy represents a woman's devotion to the Boston Symphony and to her husband. Sixty-two years ago, the late Edmund Hawes Talbot, a Boston lawyer, gave his bride as a wedding present a seat at the orchestra's Friday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall. Mrs. Talbot has attended the concerts ever since.

When her husband died, she gave the orchestra $40,000 for a new canopy as a memorial to him.

Mozart's last three symphonies were written in a single summer, when the composer was 32 years old. One can argue that an all-Mozart program ought to include different kinds of pieces instead of just symphonies. On the other hand, there is reason to perform the 39th, 40th and 41st symphonies together simply because, having been written at about the same time, they illustrate a certain phase of Mozart's artistic development. In any case, the three differ so much that it is far from monotonous to hear all three played in one evening.

The orchestra, as usual, gave an exciting performance. No wonder there were so many "bravos" for Dr. Munch at the end. And no wonder Mrs. Talbot has been so faithful to the orchestra all these years.

The Lively Arts

By Milton R. Bass

YOU CAN please some of the people some of the time, and you can please some of the people the rest of the time. But you can't please all of the people all of the time. I don't know what music festival Abe Lincoln was describing when he said the above in 1862, but it still applies around here in 1959.

Tanglewood gets rapped every year when its program for the summer season is announced. First of all, the critics start complaining about the galloping of the same old war horses and the lack of new compositions. They want to hear some daring programming, world premieres and gala first nights and enough hoopla to put some pazazz into the stories they file from the Berkshires.

NOW THERE is more than a jaded musical palate responsible for this attitude. Even the natives will have to admit that the Berkshires are a joy to visit in the summer, especially if one comes from a scorching, concrete metropolis. What could be more pleasant than a few days in our purple hills on the old expense account? Editors are a querulous bunch, however, and few can see much sense in sending a critic all the way up here just to write a few hundred words on how well polished the Boston Symphony is keeping its Beethoven.

It would be nice if Dr. Munch would try out a few of the things by the 12-tone cats or would resurrect some of the lesser-known luminaries. Of course, every time Tanglewood does try something a little new, attendance drops a lot, and they are left with an empty shell. Everybody talks about wanting something new and different, but not too many go to hear it.

There was a time when "Tanglewood on Parade" offered some variety, but Arthur Fiedler and the Pops now seems a staple. There is no denying the popularity of the Pops, but staples belong on the shelves of grocery stores and not at music festivals.

THE SYMPHONY musicians are not the only ones stuck in a mold. The so-called groovy jazz musicians are really in a groove, a groove that has about as much excitement and adventure as that worn by a blindfolded ox around a millstone.

Jazz musicians are a lazy bunch when compared to classical practitioners. Once they find a technique that brings them bread and fame, they relax and enjoy it for as long as they can get away with it. Somehow they lose the necessary drive that would force them on to new worlds and discoveries. They play the same numbers at every concert, and for some reason their adherents scream as though they were hearing it all for the first time. Who is fooling whom?

I LIKE the music of the Modern Jazz Quartet, and I admire the integrity and dedication of John Lewis, their musical director. But I am weary of hearing their impeccable renditions of "Fontessa," "One Never Knows" and "God Rest Ye Merry Gentlemen." I have heard nothing new at their live concerts in the past few years, and I think it's time they sat down and worked something new out.

George Shearing and Dizzy Gillespie fancy their comedy routines as much as they do their music nowadays, and it's reached the point where you can recite the gags line for line right along with them. They don't spend much time bringing their music or their jokes up to date, and they roll along, a trifle bored themselves perhaps, with the stuff they forged in the heat of their youth.

We are now going through a veneration period for the late Charlie Parker, and nearly every modern group in the country has climbed on the hearse with the saxophonist. They all claim to have sat in with "The Bird" at one time or another and all their concerts and records can be lumped under the title "I Remember Bird." "Strictly for the Birds" would be much more appropriate in most of the cases.

THE POINT of all this is that it is much better to be a small-town critic than a big-city critic. They are always doing new and exciting things in the cities, and we have to go in periodically to check on them. But the poor big-city critics have absolutely no excuse to journey here any more. Therefore, with each succeeding year they write less and less about us. And finally, people will forget what natural riches we have here and will stop coming. And then all the local complainers will finally have all the trees and grass and shrubbery to themselves.

Which will be a good thing for we will be forced to eat them to stay alive, and the supply will last longer with less people to devour it. And that's the way our county will end, while we bang our heads and whimper.

Final Two Mozart Concerts Draw 11,060 to Tanglewood

The final two concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival's Mozart series attracted 11,060 persons to Tanglewood over the weekend.

New Canopy Dedicated

The Saturday night program, held in the big shed, was devoted to the composer's last three symphonies, Nos. 39, 40 and 41. The program opened with the dedication of the new canopy, given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Mrs. Edmund Hawes Talbot in memory of her late husband, a Boston attorney.

Henry S. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, spoke briefly on the history of the old shell, which had been in use for 25 years. Charles Munch, music director of the orchestra, thanked Mrs. Talbot for the $40,000 gift for the canopy.

The final concert yesterday was held in the theater-concert hall. Mr. Munch again led the symphony's chamber orchestra, with the first part of the program devoted to the Prague Symphony. The second half was devoted to the Requiem, and the orchestra was joined by the festival chorus and vocal soloists, Adele Addison, Florence Kopleff, Blake Stern and Donald Gramm.

Continues Wednesday

The festival continues Wednesday night with the third in the weekly series of chamber music concerts. The Beaux Arts Trio of New York will be heard in the theater-concert hall in a program of works by Mozart, Saint-Saens, Beethoven and Copland.

The full Boston Symphony will make its first appearances at the festival in next weekend's series of concerts, Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon, all in the big shed.

Music Review

Fromm Chamber Concert at Tanglewood

JAY C. ROSENFELD

A CONCERT of contemporary chamber music in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood last night was presented under the auspices of the Fromm Music Foundation. The program consisted of two Fromm commissions and two works of recent composition by musicians only shortly passed away, although the Leos Janacek "Diary of One who Vanished" dates from 40 years ago and was written when the composer was 65.

Nevertheless, it was of great interest and requires little argument to retain its place on a program sponsored by the most powerful force now in operation at Tanglewood for the promotion of contemporary composers and of new or rare works. Furthermore, Janacek stands unique in musical history as one who never came into his own until his later years. His "Diary" is written for tenor, alto, a trio of women's voices and piano. Jesus Maria Sanroma, the pianist, was a formidable basis of support in this as he was in the other two of the three works in which he participated.

THE TENOR, Robert Price, has the major role, and he acquitted himself most ably. Miss Louise Parker, the alto, has a voice of exceptional quality, and she, as well her her tenor colleague, and the three women's voices, Marjorie Kember, Malama Providakes and Beverly Samans, all sang the anonymous poem in its original Czech. The poem is a fervent, tender love story of a ploughman and a gypsy girl, and the 13th verse is omitted and played by the piano solo for reasons not explained.

In spite of its old age in such a company, the Janacek had several aspects which excited curiosity. It has the great gushing, romantic spirit which all those following Wagner were trying to shake off, and not succeeding. It also has the spirit of so many of that era who thought the symphonic poem was one direction of emancipation. Janacek, within the limits of his media, sought to convey the intense love episode from an old Czech folk-poem much as Schoenberg, even though two decades younger, had been inspired two decades before to take a similar poem of Dehmel and write his "Verklarte Nacht."

THE OTHER "old" piece on the program was the Prokofieff sonata for flute and piano of 1943, which Doriot Anthony Dwyer evidently considered only a solo for flute although Mr. Sanroma was the pianist. This is as much a favorite in its version, by the composer, for violin and piano as in its original edition. It is a combination of peaceful and affectionate simplicity, rhythmic fascination and high, good-natured gaiety.

A quartet for violin, viola, cello and piano of Ingolf Dahl dates from 1957 and is a Fromm commission. It was played by Richard Burgin, Joseph de Pasquale, Samuel Mayes and Mr. Sanroma. Mr. Dahl, a native of Sweden, and at one time on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, was an early supporter and pamphleteer for Stravinsky. He writes with masterful knowledge of the instruments and their most effective registers. He also leaves few moments, if any, for only nonchalant collaboration. The piano seems at one hearing to be extremely demanding and the strings have vigorous, wide skips and intricate rhythms.

The first movement is a Fantasia, the second an antiphon, although the other movements, including the final rondo, seemed to employ many instances where the piano alternated with the three strings in statement and responses. It is robust and energetic music and the composer is not concerned at first impressions with harmonic relationships. The Rondo alla campanella finds the strings in closer contact with one another than had been apparent previously and there are many variations of rhythm, including fetching ragtime. The final coda leads to a surprisingly docile concluding cadence.

THE LAST number of the evening was a work of Arnold Franchetti, of Hartford, written in 1958 for 15 instruments, of which the players were Boston Symphony Orchestra members directed by Richard Burgin. The "Three Ricercari" are irregular, contrapuntal essays, patterned on a form which was used in the 16th and 17 centuries but which today has such vague meaning that it could serve any composition. Mr. Franchetti juggles his material with ease and facility so that the listener is bewildered a bit as the theme is tossed from one instrument to another and from one group to another.

He calls for one each of strings except for doubled firsts, one each of the reeds, the same of the brass, two percussionists and a piano. No executant has a good course at any stretch, not even, one might say, a good morsel, before it is snatched away from him. The composer's agility is more deft at times than the auditor's ear. It is manifestly unfair to dismiss such a competent work with an attempt to use an adroit pen, but this listener carried away an impression of the composer's wide comprehension of the means he was employing and not as deep a one of the work as a whole. Mr. Burgin graciously singled out Mr. Franchetti in the audience and obliged him to acknowledge personally the really warm reaction the performance had evoked.

SUPPORT of composers is channeled in two directions: Competitions and commissions. There can be no guarantee that one will produce more worthy results than the other. Paul Fromm with the help and guidance of some of the most able jurors in music today is making a major contribution to that department of music which needs, and has always needed, the most intelligent as well as the most driving encouragement. The audience last night included the musical elite of the area.

Record Crowd Hears Mozart At Tanglewood

By JOHN F. KYES

LENOX — Interest in the music of Mozart was high during the weekend at the Berkshire Festival. Friday's concert, starring Mme. Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer in the Piano Concerto in G major, was transferred to the large music shed when rain came. Saturday's concert, already planned for the large shed, drew the phenomenal number of 6,929 to hear three Mozart symphonies, with no soloists.

The Sunday afternoon concert, which I heard in the Theater-Concert Hall, made a weekend total of 13,647 or more than a thousand in excess of 1958's second week.

Adagio too Clean Cut

The strings and woodwinds, totaling perhaps 45, were in excellent estate and responsive to Charles Munch's direction in the "Prague" Symphony No. 38 in D major. In the opening movement, the maestro achieved results by means which sometimes seemed severe.

The Adagio was so cleancut as to be at times on the stilted side. The Allegro later in this movement was vital and flowing. Again in the Andante, one found the contrast of accurate staccato notes and gently melting phrases. Aside from the zest and skill of the Finale, in all departments, one could note especially the fine work of the woodwinds in moments where they held the forefront.

The Requiem Mass in D minor, with a more sturdy orchestration, a chorus of 60 and four favorite soloists, was wonderfully absorbing and continually uplifting.

Munch revealed in his face at the end of the concert that he had been working hard. He had drawn from four voices and the orchestra results of great fullness and sonority, and had made the chorus, of which Hugh Ross is the head, sound like much larger group by planning their dynamics and contrasts effectively.

The members of the quartet blended well. Such solo bits as the composer granted were usually for the pure-voiced and earnest soprano, Adele Addison. Florence Kopleff's contralto and Donald Gramm's bass were luscious and expressive, and they sang with admirable facial calm. Blake Stern, tenor, dependable musically, was less opulent of voice and reposeful of mien.

Floating Quality

More noteworthy even than the vigor and responsiveness of the chorus was the lovely floating quality achieved by the sopranos and altos in soft passages.

William Gibson's work on the trombone in tre "Tuba mirum" was admirable.

Despite the glories of the final "Agnus Dei," I thought the center and core of the work in breadth and tone was heard in the seventh of 12 sections, the "Lacrimosa." Strangely enough, this section was completed by Sussmayr after Mozart's death with only the 12 opening measures to point the way.

Next weekend will bring the full-sized Boston Symphony Orchestra to the large Tanglewood shed in three concerts stressing the music of Tchaikovsky, with other classicists, and one modern composer per concert.

Second Thoughts On Music

Three Concerts Unfold Many Facets of Mozart

Music Shed Filled to Capacity as Conductor Provides Splendid Moments in Three Concerts; Fromm Recital Has Youthful Audience

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX — The three concerts devoted to the music of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, conducted by Charles Munch, drew audiences estimated at some 13,000 persons who revelled in the unfolding of the many facets which made up the genius of the master. Each night the theater was filled to capacity and more than 6900 persons were on hand to hear the last three symphonies which were played in the Music Shed.

There were many splendid moments during these recitals. We remember particularly the glowing performance given the "Piano Concerto in G Major by Nicole Henroit-Schweitzer and the orchestra. It was within a small frame beautifully balanced and elegant in every phrase. We have never heard this French pianist play with greater expressivity and there was complete rapport between pianist and conductor.

Another stunning performance was that given the "Divertimento in B Flat for Strings and Two Horns. There were wonderful coloration and the virtuoso strings, led by Richard Burgin were magnificent.

If any proof was needed of the sheer genius of Mozart, it was found during the performances of the last three symphonies. There was infinite variety, melodic profusion and a sense of lightness and gaity throughout. We found particularly rewarding the performance of the "Symphony No. 40 in G Minor." The work is plainly cast in a pervasive mood and style. It is strong incisive music which attains its strength by deftness and concentration rather than through massive means.

The final concert brought us a finely detailed performance of the "Prague Symphony" and an eloquent, highly personal performance of the "Requiem in D Minor." In this performance the Festival Chorus found its groove and sang with full-throated enthusiasm. The soloists were Adele Addison, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; Blake Stern, tenor; and Donald Gramm, bass. The two women and Mr. Gramm sang with a superb sense of line and vocal opulence. Mr. Stern lacks many of the qualifications necessary for fine singing. It was an intimate, reverent performance, rich in detail and inner strength.

The New York Pro Musica group was heard here for the second time, giving the second of the chamber music concerts. This is a very special group of singers and instrumentalists who play rare instruments and specialize in seldom heard music. The concert was devoted to the music of Monteverdi and Baroque composers. There was never a dull moment, for with so many combinations available within the group, a wide variety of programming is possible. One listened to duets, trios, quartets, solos for harpsichord and viola and splendid ensemble numbers like "Làmento d'Arianna," the most familiar work on the program. Infinite attention is taken by the group to every detail and the result is highly polished, seemingly effortless performance. It takes true musicianship and devotion to perform programs the way the Pro Musica group always seems to do.

The Fromm Music Foundation is doing more than any other organization we know to further the cause of contemporary music. Through subscriptions and scholarships it is creating interest in new works and aiding in the composition of the same.

The first concert given in the Theater drew a very select group of listeners, predominately youthful. The program offered two commissioned works and two works by musicians only recently deceased. Only Leni Janacek's song cycle for tenor, alto and trio of women's voices and piano was aged. It was written in 1906, which brings up a question of how old must a composition be to continue to be known as "contemporary." Whatever its age, the Janacek work fitted neatly into the program. It was sung in fine style by tenor Robert Price and alto Louise Parker who has quite the most exciting voice we have heard here in some seasons. Jesus Maria Sanroma, a pianist of fine attainments, was at the piano and proved an invaluable member of the group. Janacek gives the pianist a solo in this cycle. The work is entitled "Diary of One Who Vanished" and its texts are taken from scraps of poetry found in the room of a man who did vanish. There were 22 such poems. They were sung in the original Czech. Mr. Price revealed a light tenor voice, well projected and colored. He sang with feeling and revealed exceptional musicianship.

Of the two commissioned works, we found most pleasure in the "Quartet for Violin, Viola, Cello and Piano," superbly played by Messers. Burgin, De Pasquale, Mayes and Sanroma. It was written in 1957 by Ingolf Dahl, a native Sweden who has been at the Berkshire Center. Its three movements are extremely listenable and the four fine musicians played it with much expressiveness. The second commissioned work was a suite of "Three Ricercari for 15 Instruments" written in 1958 by Arnold Franchetti of Hartford. Richard Burgin conducted and more difficult music to con-

by A. C. S.

Works by Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart made up the programs for the second weekend of this season. Five of the symphonies were played: Nos. 35, 38, 39, 40 and 41, the last three comprising the Saturday evening offering. Both Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were in fine form and the symphonies were given exciting readings. The Jupiter, especially, benefited from the obviously thorough preparation.

Unfortunately, the same cannot be said of the Sunday afternoon presentation of the Requiem Mass. Here the orchestral playing was sloppy. Despite the excellent singing of Adele Adison, sopgrano, Florence Kopleff, contralto, Blake Stern, tenor, and Donald Gramm, bass, it was a curious and sadly disappointing performance. Mr. Munch took the Dies irae at such a frantic tempo that one would have supposed Berlioz was the composer. The general approach was "romantic" with arbitrary ritards which more than once destroyed phrasing. The finely executed pianissimos of the Festival Chorus were negated by too heavy orchestral accompaniment. It was a sad ending to an otherwise rewarding series.

Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer appeared as soloist in the G major Piano Concerto Friday evening. There was evident rapport between soloist and conductor which, with Mme. Henriot-Schweitzer's clean and beautifully phrased playing, resulted in a most refreshing performance.

The new stage canopy in the Shed, which was dedicated Saturday evening, proves to be quite effective. It is especially helpful to the wind section of the orchestra and provides a more even distribution of sound for those who prefer to hear the music from the lawns.

3 MODERN WORKS HEARD AT LENOX

Fromm Foundation Program Offers Music of Janacek, Franchetti and Dahl

By ERIC SALZMAN
Special to The New York Times.

LENOX, Mass, July 13—The twentieth century got its licks in at Tanglewood, although it usually turns up at less publicized events.

Monday night's program in the Theatre Concert Hall was presented under the auspices of the Fromm Music Foundation, which devotes itself to helping contemporary music. It has a particularly wide range of activities at Tanglewood. Two of the works presented Monday were commissioned by the foundation.

Arnold Franchetti's Three Ricercari for Fifteen Instruments is a striking and clever work, which uses fragmentary sonorities, a percussion background and rhythmic changes to build up movements of some intensity.

Its major fault lies in the use of rather neutral melodic and harmonic material, which contrasts with the very individual setting. Only the final Ricercare seemed successful in all its aspects, partly because of a clearer constructive logic.

The work was given its first performance by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Richard Burgin. The execution was competent, although a little more precision may have been desirable.

Many Effective Moments

Ingolf Dahn, who has studied for a number of summers at Tanglewood, was represented by a work originally commissioned by the foundation for performance at the University of Illinois. The composition, a quartet for piano, violin, viola and 'cello, has many effective moments, but each of the three movements has a striking defect.

The first section is caught up in a motor rhythm that does not leave room for enough flexibility or contrast. The final rondo is stop and go; it does not hang together. The slow movement, antiphonal in nature, has the most shape and direction; but the composer forgot to stop, when he finished what he had to say.

The work received an excellent performance by Mr. Burgin and Joseph de Pasquale, violinists; Samuel Mayes, 'cellist, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist.

The extended week-end went out the way it came in—in a pouring rain. The thunder and rattle of the rain on the roof was unfortunately at its worst during a flute sonata by Serge Prokofieff. This genial and typical work was bravely performed by Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flutist, and Mr. Sanroma. Somehow, it managed to make an effect through the accompanying roar of the elements.

The other work on the program was "The Diary of One Who Vanished," by the Czechoslovak composer Leos Janacek.

The setting of a group of impassioned love poems by an unknown village youth is a sort of Eastern European "Tristan and Isolde." It displays the composer's original use of late nineteenth-century techniques with an understanding and moving use of the human voice.

The major role, that of a tenor, was sung by Robert Price, who, despite some vocal limitations, gave an understanding performance of the difficult part. Louise Parker was the excellent alto. Three talented Tanglewood students, Marjorie Kember, Malama Providakes and Beverly Samans represented the women's chorus. All performed the remarkable feat of singing their parts in Czechoslovak. Mr. Sanroma played the important, almost symphonic piano part.

This is a very special group of singers and instrumentalists who play rare instruments and specialize in seldom heard music. The concert was devoted to the music of Monteverdi and Baroque composers. There was never a dull moment, for with so many combinations available within the group, a wide variety of programming is possible. One listened to duets, trios, quartets, solos for harpsichord and viola and splendid ensemble numbers like "Lamento d'Arianna," the most familiar work on the program. Infinite attention is taken by the group to every detail and the result is highly polished, seemingly effortless performance. It takes true musicianship and devotion to perform programs the way the Pro Musica group always seems to do.

The Fromm Music Foundation is doing more than any other organization we know to further the cause of contemporary music. Through subscriptions and scholarships it is creating interest in new works and aiding in the composition of the same.

The first concert given in the Theater drew a very select group of listeners, predominately youthful. The program offered two commissioned works and two works by musicians only recently deceased. Only Leni Janacek's song cycle for tenor, alto and trio of women's voices and piano was aged. It was written in 1908, which brings up a question of how old must a composition be to continue to be known as "contemporary." Whatever its age, the Janacek work fitted neatly into the program. It was sung in fine style by tenor Robert Price and alto Louise Parker who has quite the most exciting voice we have heard here in some seasons. Jesus Maria Sanroma, a pianist of fine attainments, was at the piano and proved an invaluable member of the group. Janacek gives the pianist a solo in this cycle. The work is entitled "Diary of One Who Vanished" and its texts are taken from scraps of poetry found in the room of a man who did vanish. There were 22 such poems. They were sung in the original Czech. Mr. Price revealed a light tenor voice, well projected and colored. He sang with feeling and revealed exceptional musicianship.

Of the two commissioned works, we found most pleasure in the "Quartet for Violin, Viola, Cello and Piano," superbly played by Messers. Burgin, De Pasquale, Mayes and Sanroma. It was written in 1957 by Ingolf Dahl, a native Sweden who has been at the Berkshire Center. Its three movements are extremely listenable and the four fine musicians played it with much expresaiveness. The second commissioned work was a suite of "Three Ricercari for 15 Instruments" written in 1958 by Arnold Franchetti of Hartford. Richard Burgin conducted and more difficult music to con-

Works by Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart made up the programs for the second weekend of this season. Five of the symphonies were played: Nos. 35, 38, 39, 40 and 41, the last three comprising the Saturday evening offering. Both Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were in fine form and the symphonies were given exciting readings. The Jupiter, especially, benefited from the obviously thorough preparation.

Unfortunately, the same cannot be said of the Sunday afternoon presentation of the Requiem Mass. Here the orchestral playing was sloppy. Despite the excellent singing of Adele Adison, sopgrano, Florence Kopleff, contralto, Blake Stern, tenor, and Donald Gramm, bass, it was a curious and sadly disappointing performance. Mr. Munch took the Dies irae at such a frantic tempo that one would have supposed Berlioz was the composer. The general approach was "romantic" with arbitrary ritards which more than once destroyed phrasing. The finely executed pianissimos of the Festival Chorus were negated by too heavy orchestral accompaniment. It was a sad ending to an otherwise rewarding series.

Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer appeared as soloist in the G major Piano Concerto Friday evening. There was evident rapport between soloist and conductor which, with Mme. Henriot-Schweitzer's clean and beautifully phrased playing, resulted in a most refreshing performance.

The new stage canopy in the Shed, which was dedicated Saturday evening, proves to be quite effective. It is especially helpful to the wind section of the orchestra and provides a more even distribution of sound for those who prefer to hear the music from the lawns.

3 MODERN WORKS HEARD AT LENOX

Fromm Foundation Program Offers Music of Janacek, Franchetti and Dahl

By ERIC SALZMAN
Special to The New York Times.

LENOX, Mass, July 13—The twentieth century got its licks in at Tanglewood, although it usually turns up at less publicized events.

Monday night's program in the Theatre Concert Hall was presented under the auspices of the Fromm Music Foundation, which devotes itself to helping contemporary music. It has a particularly wide range of activities at Tanglewood. Two of the works presented Monday were commissioned by the foundation.

Arnold Franchetti's Three Ricercari for Fifteen Instruments is a striking and clever work, which uses fragmentary sonorities, a percussion background and rhythmic changes to build up movements of some intensity.

Its major fault lies in the use of rather neutral melodic and harmonic material, which contrasts with the very individual setting. Only the final Ricercare seemed successful in all its aspects, partly because of a clearer constructive logic.

The work was given its first performance by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Richard Burgin. The execution was competent, although a little more precision may have been desirable.

Many Effective Moments

Ingolf Dahn, who has studied for a number of summers at Tanglewood, was represented by a work originally commissioned by the foundation for performance at the University of Illinois. The composition, a quartet for piano, violin, viola and 'cello, has many effective moments, but each of the three movements has a striking defect.

The first section is caught up in a motor rhythm that does not leave room for enough flexibility or contrast. The final rondo is stop and go; it does not hang together. The slow movement, antiphonal in nature, has the most shape and direction; but the composer forgot to stop, when he finished what he had to say.

The work received an excellent performance by Mr. Burgin and Joseph de Pasquale, violinists; Samuel Mayes, 'cellist, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist.

The extended week-end went out the way it came in—in a pouring rain. The thunder and rattle of the rain on the roof was unfortunately at its worst during a flute sonata by Serge Prokofieff. This genial and typical work was bravely performed by Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flutist, and Mr. Sanroma. Somehow it managed to make an effect through the accompanying roar of the elements.

The other work on the program was "The Diary of One Who Vanished," by the Czechoslovak composer Leos Janacek.

The setting of a group of impassioned love poems by an unknown village youth is a sort of Eastern European "Tristan and Isolde." It displays the composer's original use of late nineteenth-century techniques with an understanding and moving use of the human voice.

The major role, that of a tenor, was sung by Robert Price, who, despite some vocal limitations, gave an understanding performance of the difficult part. Louise Parker was the excellent alto. Three talented Tanglewood students, Marjorie Kember, Malama Providakes and Beverly Samans represented the women's chorus. All performed the remarkable feat of singing their parts in Czechoslovak. Mr. Sanroma played the important almost symphonic piano part.

SUMMER MUSIC

There's no dearth of fresh air symphonic ensembles in the land; nor conventions of jazz and folk and full-voiced choruses. The batons are busy whether they prod beatnik or Bach. And Americans and visitors from abroad are plunking themselves down on hardwood benches, canvas folding chairs and close-cropped lawns, to listen to the tonal totals. Every year brings with it the announcement of new fesitvals, new tents, new arenas assembled to the muses. And the jobs that are being done here in the full-breadth of the U.S.A. are deep rooted in musical awareness and rich in individual talents.

The EMPIRE STATE MUSIC FESTIVAL, despite flood and wind, in earlier seasons have found themselves an inspiring new site to pitch their tent theatre for this year's schedule. The Anthony Wayne Recreation area in Bear Mountain-Harriman State Park resounded to the full pitch of a Leopold Stokowski conducted Soviet worksheet of music opening night. Ballet, Opera and individual artists will follow one upon the other through the weeks. Frank Forest is the Festival's resourceful general manager.

At Ttnglewood, in the soft roll ing Berkshire Mountain country, the visitors pour in. This is the nineteenth season for the Music Center in Lenox and for all those years it has not only been an area where eminent conductors have raised their batons to lead the Boston Symphony through notable compositions but it has been a meeting place where student musicians build mould their talents under experienced professional musicians.

We attended the dedication of an imaginative new sounding board that is something new in acoustical patterns. What looks like a flight of triangles into infinity form an ingenious canopy to reflect the harmonic ensemble that flows from the stage. Conductor Charles Munch led his skilled men through the silken sounding last three symphonies of Mozart. The preponderence of strings, which serve Mozart well, were beautifully handled. And if this in part was due to the new arrangement of sounding boards, thanks in no small part is due Mrs. Edmund H. Talbot of Boston who donated the needed $40,000. Also to canopy designer Eero Saarinen who, with his associate consultants, devised the project.

The student chamber music performances, the presentation of new works of young Americans, the appearance of Pierre Monteux as guest conductor, the hidden in the various glens practicing of young musicians from all over the world, the morning rehearsals of the Boston old hands, all make for an overflowing cornucopia of music set in a breathless sylvan setting. Tanglewood and its Foundations are a striking example of musical America at its very best.

TANGLEWOOD, MASS.

■ A new stage canopy in the Music Shed at Tanglewood was officially dedicated on Saturday evening, July 11, in the intermission of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival concert. Dr. Charles Munch, Music Director of the Orchestra, participated in these ceremonies with Henry B. Cabot, president of the Orchestra's Board of Trustees, and Mrs. Edna Betts Talbot of Boston, donor of the canopy, who has given $40,000 to the Orchestra as a memorial to her husband, the late Edmund Hawes Talbot, Boston lawyer.

Eero Saarinen, who drew up the original plans for the Shed, was the chief architect. The new canopy is suspended from the roof trusses by steel cables and consists of triangular panels of graduated sizes connected tip to tip. The sidewalls of the stage are solid, with openings between each triangle, and this permits the audience seated within an arc of 110 degrees to see the orchestra.

The canopy, which gives a "new look" to the Shed, has further aided its fine acoustics.

The opening concert on July 3 was held in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Dr. Munch presented Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, the Suite No. 2 in B Minor for flute and strings, the "Musical Offering" and Cantata No. 40, "Nun ist das Heil und die Kraft" for double chorus and orchestra. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, the flute soloist, displayed an excellent technique and a delicate tone. The Festival Chorus, due to lack of sufficient preparation time, was weak and did not have the proper solidity of tone.

The following evening, in the Music Shed, Dr. Munch presented a gem of a concert, consisting of four Bach concertos and Suite No. 4 in D major. Lukas Foss, pianist, appeared in all four concertos and was soloist in No. 5 in F minor and No. 1 in D minor. It was a memorable experience to hear both the concertos for three claviers on the same program. Ralph Berkowitz, dean of the Berkshire Music Center, and Bernard Zighera, harpist of the Boston Symphony, were Mr. Foss' keyboard colleagues. The three pianists played in complete unison and gave a thrilling performance.

The concert on Sunday afternoon, concluding the first weekend, was held in the Theatre-Concert Hall and consisted of the Brandenburg Concerto No. 6; the Cantata No. 51, for solo soprano "Jauchzet Gott in Allen Landen;" the Concerto for Violin and Oboe in D minor; and Suite No. 3 in D major for orchestra. High points were the florid and lovely singing of Bethany Beardslee in the cantata, and the playing of Ruth Oissek, violinist, and Ralph Gomberg, oboist, in the concerto for violin and oboe, blending perfectly with each other and with the orchestra.

The following weekend was devoted to works of Mozart. On Friday evening, July 10, due to rain, the concert was transferred from the Theatre-Concert Hall to the Music Shed. Despite the thick fog which worked its way insidiously into the shed and into the instruments, the orchestra performed the Overture to "Don Giovanni" with great spirit. Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer played the Piano Concerto in G major, K. 453 and displayed sensitive musicianship, secure technique and graceful style. The Divertimento in B flat major for strings and two horns, K. 287, was particularly well done by the violin section. The evening's concert concluded with the "Haffner" Symphony.

On Saturday evening in the Music Shed the orchestra presented the Symphony No. 39 in E Flat major, the familiar G minor Symphony No. 40, and the "Jupiter" Symphony, which stirred the vast audience with its dramatic power.

Sunday afternoon, concluded the second weekend of the Festival and the Mozart series. The concert was performed in the Theatre-Concert Hall and opened with the "Prague" Symphony. Dr. Munch again demonstrated his gifts for producing a performance of power and stirring emotional impact. In the "Requiem Mass" the soloists were Adele Addison, soprano, Florence Kopleff, contralto, Blake Stern, tenor, and Donald Gramm, bass. All were excellent and performed beautifully together. The Festival Chorus, Hugh Ross director, showed marked improvement over their last performance and produced an exciting and solid tone.

It is a joy to hear music performed so nobly in the garden oasis of the "friendly" Berkshire mountains. No sound of screaming jet airplanes intrudes. Let us thank our good fortune!

This musical was adapted from the prize winning play, "They Knew What They Wanted," by Sidney Howard. Frank Loesser, who wrote the music, lyrics and words for "Most Happy Fella," is the same popular composer who wrote, "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes" and "Where's Charlie."

The leading role of Rosabella, the mail order bride, will be played by Darlene Hurst who is returning to the Arundel Opera theater after one year's absence. Wesley Boynton, tenor, of this city, will appear in the leading male role of Tony, the middle aged owner of a grape farm. Morse Haithwaite, of this city will be the musical director.

Connecticut Musical Events Listed In U. S. Calendar

By GORDON E. ARMSTRONG

The national music calendar grows apace! Of course, the past decade has witnessed an ever widening extension of what used to be known as the "concert season" to the present year-long dimension. One may now hear almost as many diversified concert programs during the summer months as are available throughout the rest of the year. As a matter of fact, many music devotees have discovered that summers provide an ideal "time for listening."

We are reminded of this year's busy summer schedule of musical activities by glancing through the first U. S. Summer Music Calendar issued last month by the President's Music Committee of the People-to-People Program. Mention was made here several weeks ago of the Music Committee's first International Music Calendar (1959) which made a belated appearance in April. Well over 550 musical activities are listed in this latest calendar, though admittedly this figure does not represent an entire listing of the country's summer programs.

Of particular interest to us is the calendar's listing of musical activities in Connecticut this summer. As far as this [illegible] concerned, the calendar would seem to be rather comprehensive. The two recent events — New Haven's Festival of the [illegible] the Regional Convention of the American Guild of Organists in New Haven both find a place in the listings. Other Connecticut current events listed include the following: Starlight Festival of Chamber Music (New Haven); Norfolk Music School [illegible] (Norfolk); Connecticut Pops (Fairfield); Connecticut Valley Music Festival (Deep River); Silvermine Guild Concerts (New Canaan); Music Mountain Chamber Music Series (Falls Village), and others.

The two music calendars are the most recent evidence of the commendable work which the President's Music Committee is doing in fulfilling its important function as a phase of the People-to-People Program. The committee also gathers and releases information concerning music competitions throughout the world and acts as an international "clearing house" for music news generally. Incidentally, copies of both calendars may be obtained by sending 25 cents to the Music Committee, 1916 F Street, N. W., Washington 6, D. C.

SECOND STARLIGHT FESTIVAL CONCERT

The second concert of the Starlight Festival of Chamber Music is to be given in the Saybrook College Courtyard on Tuesday evening at 8:30. As reported after the opening program, the new locale of the present series is ideal acoustically, with no concert shell needed as formerly.

A "solid string program" is in the offing for Tuesday's listeners with three quartets making up the program. The works to be heard include Mozart's Quartet in A, No. 5 (K. 464), Dvorak's Quartet in E flat, No. 3 (Op. 51), and the Quartet No. 3 by Yale's Quincy Porter.

In the nature of things, major interest will center in the string work by Porter, the program's only contemporary offering. The Yale faculty member is recognized as a leading composer in the chamber music field and several of his string quartets have been successfully performed here by various ensembles in our Sprague Hall Chamber Music Series. The New Haven Symphony has also performed some of Porter's works in the larger category. The composer conducted the orchestra in a performance of his Viola Concerto in 1949, with the eminent violist, William Primrose, as the soloist. More recently, Frank Brieff conducted the orchestra in a performance of Porter's Pulitzer Prize winning Concerto for two pianos and orchestra with Bruce and Rosalind Simonds as the soloists.

Tuesday's concert will again present the regular quartet of players — Julius Scheir and Ann Barak, violins; Meyer Katz, viola, and Frank Levy, cello.

NORFOLK MUSIC SCHOOL CONCERT

The fourth program in the Norfolk Music School concerts will take place on Wednesday afternoon at 3:30 in the Music Shed at Norfolk. The group of faculty members who will participate in the program include the following: Robert Brink, violin; Lillian Fuchs, viola; Aldo Parisot, cello; Warren Stannard, oboe; Arthur Hague and director Bruce Simonds, piano.

The contemporary work in the program is to be the Serenade for oboe and strings, by Prof. Richard Donovan of the Yale Music School faculty. The three other works to be performed include Bach's Quintet in F (oboe, strings, and clavier), Mozart's E flat Quartet (piano and strings), and Faure's Quartet No. 1 in C minor (piano and strings).

POPS AT FAIRFIELD ON FRIDAY

The Connecticut Symphony inaugurates its second decade of Pop concerts with the first of three scheduled concerts at Fairfield University Field on Friday evening at 8:30. The inimitable film luminary and pianist, Jose Iturbi, will appear in the dual role of pianist and conductor and the other guest artist is to be the 20-year-old Canadian soprano, Teresa Stratas.

JOSE ITURBI

Iturbi will be on the podium for the following group of works which he has selected because of their popularity with Pops audiences: Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"; Granados' Intermezzo from "Goyescas"; de Falla's Dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat"; Magenti's "Mediterranean Suite." From the keyboard, he will conduct another work which he has found to be an outstanding favorite with listeners at outdoor programs — the Grieg A minor Concerto. The accomplished young soprano, who won the 1958 Metropolitan Opera Auditions, will add vocal allure to the program with a group of popular operatic arias.

Some weeks ago it was reported that the advance sale of tickets for this latest series was the best in the history of the concerts. That is understandable since such singing stars as Eartha Kitt and Eleanor Steber will appear later in the present series. The former, with Maurice Levine conducting, will perform in the second program on July 31. The great "Met" soprano will appear under the baton of Evan Whallon in the final event on August 14. Tickets may be obtained here at Cutler's.

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL CONCERTS

The main concerts at the Berkshire Music Festival, with the full Boston Symphony participating during the next four weekends, will get under way on Friday evening at 8:30. Charles Munch will conduct the program which consists of Berlioz' "Corsair" Overture, "Parables," by Bohuslav Martinu, and Tchaikovsky's Sixth.

Dr. Munch will share the podium in Saturday evening's concert with Lukas Foss who will conduct his own "Symphony of Chorales." The program also lists Weber's "Oberon" Overture and Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto, with Isaac Stern as soloist.

Next Sunday afternoon's concert at 2:30 to be conducted by Pierre Monteux, will feature a performance of D'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Air," with the celebrated young French pianist, Nicole Henriot-Scheitzer, as soloist. The other offerings include: Introduction and Wedding March from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Coq d'Or," Debussy's Afternoon of a Faun, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth.

Briefs . . . Robert Conant, harpsichordist, and oboist Warren Stannard will be the guest artists in this afternoon's concert at 4 by the Berkshire Quartet at Music Mountain . . . Composer-pianist Paul Creston, violinist Paul Wolfe, violist Melvin Berger, pianist Leonid Hambro, and soprano Joan Brainerd form a distinguished artist listing for today's opening program of the Silvermine Guild series.

Beaux Arts Trio At Tanglewood Is Memorable

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX—I believe that when this current Berkshire Music Festival is ended I shall remember more vividly than any other concert, the concert I heard Wednesday night given by the Beaux Arts Trio of New York. In a very few years, Menahem Pressler, pianist; Daniel Guilet, violin and Bernard Greenhouse have merged themselves into about as flawless and ensemble as may be heard today.

Each is master of his instrument and this, along with the tremendous projection and person lity of pianist Pressler assures rewarding performance of anything we have heard them play. There should have been many, many more people than the estimated 1216 present to hear this program which consisted of the "Trio in G Major, K. 564" by Mozart; Saint-Saens' "Trio No. I, in F Major;" Copland's "Vitebsk" and Beethoven's "Trio in E Flat, Op. 70, No. 2."

Mozart's trio is full of gayety and light. It was played with infinite grace and finesse. The performance was bouyant, elegantly phrased and rich in subtleties.

Camille Saint-Saens, wrote only two trios. The one played Wednesday was written when he was 28 years lod. It is a spacious affirmative work pianistically rich, as might be expected. It is a gay and alluring work with beautiful moments for all instruments. Few trios close with such tender and intimate phrases. The players revelled in the work. It's always fun to watch Mr. Pressler's expressive features. Does a phrase please him, his face lights up; is the moment dramatic, he too becomes dramatic and his concern that the ensemble be perfect is heartening to watch.

The Beethoven trio is the companion of the so-called "Ghost" trio of the same opus. It is however, more lyrical than its companion. In fact, it has been pointed out that it is Shubertian in its lyricism. This is particularly visible in the entrancing melody of the second allegretto, but there are details and transitions which only Beethoven was capable of producing. The piano dominates almost from the first, always tending to take the lead. What a fine time Pressler had in this performance, but he was not alone, for the instruments of Messers Guilet and Greenhouse sang magnificently. They indeed had bravura parts, particularly in the finale, a brilliant movement. No wonder there were bravos flying about as the performance concluded.

Aaron Copland's "Vitebsk," a study on a Jewish theme, is a strongly affirmative work. It was written in 1929 and was based upon a folk song from "The Dybbuk," an opera by Anski. This is the only work in which the composer used a theme not his own. The music is stringent, acid and dissonant, yet it is a powerful utterance achieved with uncanny skill. Mr. Copland was present to share in the polite applause.

Music Review

The Beaux Arts Trio

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

Aaron Copland

THE THIRD chamber music event of the Tanglewood season was a concert in the Theater-Concert Hall played by the Beaux Arts Trio of New York last night. The program included two works which excited much interest and curiosity, the first Saint-Saens trio and Aaron Copland's Study on a Jewish Theme, "Vitebsk."

The members of the trio: Menahem Pressler, piano, Daniel Guilet, violin, and Bernard Greenhouse, cello, enclosed these two novelties between the Mozart G major trio (K564) and the Beethoven E flat, Opus 70 No. 2. These are both heavily weighted in favor of the piano, and Pressler's deftness was the exact attribute needed for their delightful conveyance. The two strings accentuated the background to which both Mozart and Beethoven here assign them by exercising either, or both, caution or an excessive sense of refinement. They allowed much of the decorative phrasings to vanish at each punctuation mark until it became a pattern. But Pressler's playing was a constant marvel of execution and most impressive in phrasing.

THE CAREER of Saint-Saens is usually surprising to anyone who may have forgotten his accomplishments. Born but two years after Brahms, he outlived Debussy, and was a great power and influence during all his long lifetime. But much of his music is now laid aside. Thus the first trio was a witty revival and an engaging vehicle for the Beaux Artisans, especially for a work only four years short of its centenary.

The cello has the first theme, an infectiously gay rhythmic device, which passes to the violin and then, for its fuller flowering, to the piano. The rhythmic idiom bridges bar lines much as did some of Brahms' long-lined syncopations, and it is full of ingenious and novel effects, some of which, we would think, do not warrant its late neglect.

BUT THE SPARK of the evening was provided by Aaron Copland's "Vitebsk." This dates back 30 years and takes its point of departure, it would seem, from the composer's attendance at a performance of the play "The Dybbuk," wherein a folk song, used as background music, is heard.

This is one of only two uses Copland made of music from Jewish sources. It takes its special character from the nature of the mood Copland seeks and succeeds in achieving and also from the means. It abounds in harsh dissonances, incredible at first, until one realizes that they are intended and not merely untrue playing.

COPLAND MAKES use of quarter-tones, both raised and lowered, and asks for brazen, blunt and inelegant tone [illegible] of course, are possible only on strings. The mood is further compounded by the piano which counters these unusual intervals by playing both major and minor triads polytonally. The effect is remarkably telling and all the more so because it has been used because of inner compulsion, and not from any urge merely to join the faction which Alois Haba, and, for an instant, Ernest Bloch, sought to establish for quarter-tone music back at the time Copland was working on this trio.

The poignant wail seems to fit the expressiveness of the Jews of the city of Vitebsk, a town situated in White Russia on both banks of the Dwina, and of which Jews comprised a large element before World War I.

Mr. Copland was in the audience and when the artists pointed to him the audience was happy to convey to him, as well as to the performers, their expression of deep enjoyment of the work.

Concert: 'The Parables'

Martinu Work Given at Lenox Festival

By HAROLD SCHONBERG
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., July 17 — Another week-end of the Berkshire Festival got under way this balmy evening. Charles Munch was the conductor, and the program had one novelty on it — Bohuslav Martinu's "The Parables.' Berlioz' "Corsair" Overture and Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" Symphony were the other works.

The large-scale Martinu score, in three movements, contains three musical parables—the parable of a sculpture, the parable of a garden and the parable of a labyrinth. Naturally some extra-musical content is present, though one can read into the parables exactly as much or as little as one desires. That is the great virtue of any parable.

Musically the score once again pointed up the perplexing case of Mr. Martinu, a sincere, talented and well-equipped composer. He always writes music that is assured, that is dramatic and lyric by turns, that is expertly orchestrated and put together. His harmonic idiom is traditional. Mr. Martinu swims happily in the post-Romantic ocean, bowing to no particular school and writing exactly the music he wants to write.

His "Parables" is a Franco-Russian mixture with some novel touches of orchestration. Yet with all the good points about the music, it impresses as an exercise in technique rather than an expression of strong, individual ideas. The materials he uses sound second-hand and somehow fail to stimulate. One leaves the score with a vague notion of having heard it all before, somewhere, sometime.

Bohuslav Martinu

Mr. Munch led the "Parables" with conviction. It is dedicated to him, and thus he has a proprietary interest in it. In the "Corsair," which opened the program, there were some rough details—Mr. Munch is not the precisionist type of conductor though the over-all performance was swashbuckling enough.

One point about his excellent performance of the "Pathétique" deserves mention. Unlike many conductors, he started the third movement at the indicated "allegro molto vivace," and he held that tempo to the end of the march. Too many conductors start too slowly, hoping to achieve a big build-up; and only too many are tempted to make a big slowdown at the climax.

None of this vulgarity marred Mr. Munch's clear, logical performance; and the Boston Symphony was in brilliant form for him.

TANGLEWOOD — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the Music Shed concerts tonight at 8:30 with Dr. Charles Munch on the podium for the first of four Friday Berkshire Nights performances. The orchestra will present tonight Berlioz' "Corsair" overture, "Parables" by Bohuslav Martinu and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony.

"Parables" was commissioned by Dr. Munch and dedicated to him. It had its first performance under his direction in Boston during the past season.

Foss To Conduct

Dr. Munch will conduct the concert tomorrow night, opening the program with the "Oberon" overture by Weber. Lukas Foss will then conduct a performance of his own work, "Symphony of Chorales." The work, based on four chorale texts, was first performed by the Pittsburgh Symphony on Oct. 24, 1958. It was also performed in Boston under the composer's direction and later by the New York Philharmonic.

Tomorrow night's program will conclude with Tchaikovsky's violin concerto with Isaac Stern as soloist. Mr. Stern also will be heard as soloist with the BSO on Friday, July 24, and Sunday Aug. 2.

Pierre Monteux will make his first guest appearance at the 1959 Festival Sunday afternoon at 2:30. His program will include the introduction and wedding march from the opera, "Coq d'or" by Rimsky-Korsakov, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," the "Symphony on a French Mountain Air" by D'Indy, with Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer as piano soloist, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

The BSO rehearsal tomorrow morning at 10 will be open to the public for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

New Shell Is the Most

By MILES KASTENDIECK

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass., July 18.—what many still consider the opening of the Berkshire Festival occurred with the arrival of the full Boston Symphony Orchestra in the music shed last night.

It was the beginning of the Tchaikovsky weekend, actually the third of the festival. A crowd of 7,696 attended.

What they heard sounded different from previous festivals because the orchestra was playing in the new Talbot canopy which replaces the old shell used for the past 25 years.

If the sound has grown more brilliant, it has also grown deeper. Violas and cellos come through more richly, grounding the bass more effectively. The clarity is such that the musicians will have to play impeccably since the least raggedness shows up.

Music in Flight

Painted a dark gray, the canopy highlights the lighting of the orchestra so that the white-coated musicians fairly gleam in contrast.

Because of its suspended triangles, the music appears literally to take flight pictorially as well as aurally. The carrying power is impressive at the back of the shed, therefore the sound gets almost too loud in front. On the lawn it is almost phenomenal.

Though Tchaikovsky is the composer of the weekend, only the "Pathetique" Symphony represented him. Berlioz supplied the opening overture, "The Corsaire," somewhat incongruously.

PARK DOLL . . . Iva Withers appears as Adelaide in "Guys and Dolls," starting Tuesday night at the Hudson Celebration Theatre-in-the-Park. Lloyd Bridges and Harvey Stone are co-starred in the musical hit, which plays through Aug. 2.

The modern work, which Charles Munch has frequently included in the past, was Martinu's "The Parables," heard in New York last season.

A somewhat circusy performance of the Berlioz, a searching one of the Martinu, and a singular one of the Tchaikovsky characterized the concert.

As a study in orchestral textures, the Martinu makes fascinating listening. It is, of course, more than that; but last night when one was conscious of sound, Martinu's closely-knit fabric held special interest.

3 Parables

Of the three parables, that of the garden appears to offer little more than sound. Those of the sculpture and the labyrinth have more profile. Some listeners might feel still that they were wandering in a maze in all three parts. This music grows on acquaintance.

Munch has always shown partiality to the "Pathetique." Its emotional depths stir him. He communicates its most profound pages powerfully.

Some sudden spurts in tempo creep into a performance, and sometimes a dramatic accent loses its full impact, but the essence of the work flows nobly, conveying spiritual satisfaction. Tchaikovsky shone in all his glory.

Boston Symphony Puts Pep Into Lenox Series

First of Four Concerts Provides Familiar Program Aimed to Attract Family Groups

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX—This old town really woke up Friday. All day long busses and cars unloaded their passengers and long before the opening shed concert by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Charles Munch, the grounds were crowded with a heterogeneous mass of people who seemed to have only two things in common, a love of music and, to paraphrase Kipling, the clothing that they wore was nothing much before and little less than half of that behind. An estimated 7696 people attended.

Berlioz Overture Played

This concert is the first of a series of four Berkshire nights aimed to bring families to the concerts. This probably accounts for the relatively familiar program arranged by Mr. Munch. It opened with the Overture to "The Corsaire" by Berlioz and closed with Tschaikowsky's "Symphony No. 6 in B Minor," familiarly known as the "Pathetique."

In between these two war horses was a three-part work by Bohuslav Martinu titled "The Parables." The work was commissioned by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and is dedicated to Charles Munch. It was completed in 1958 and received its first performance in Boston during that year. The three episodes are entitled "The Parable of a Sculpture," "The Parable of Garden" and "The Parable of a Labyrinth."

The parables have all the characteristics to make for agreeable listening. The three movements seem to be the result of abstract thoughts, the opening movement dealing with feelings of one who has looked at a statue; the second movement dealing with one who sits in a garden and the final movement a conversaition between a man and the Seus.

The musical patterns in the first two episodes are pleasant and varied, ranging from the dramatic to the tender and there are some exquisite solo moments.

Episode Frenetic

The final episode is more frenetic in character, at times almost martial, yet there is a tendency toward resignment and reflection, never total, for the fundamental spirit is always visible. Mr. Munch labored mightily and the men played magnificently, something they can do if so disposed.

It seems unnecessary at this late date to go into an interpretation of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony. The music always speaks for itself regardless of what a conductor does with it. Mr. Munch adds little to what has gone before in the interpretation of the symphony. What he has got is a superb orchestra to provide what he wants. The performance had throughout one was aware, as John Burk put it, that tones to Tschaikowsky were pure, sensuous delight, his salvation when life threatened to become insupportable."

Saturday night Mr. Munch will open the program with the overture to "Oberon" by Weber. Then Lukas Foss will take over the baton to conduct his "Symphony of Chorales, for Orchestra." Issac Stern will conclude the program with a performance of the Tschaikowsky "Violin Concerto in D Major."

Fashion note—Those listening to music outside the shell must remove shoes and stockings to be fashionable, as the past two weeks have shown that bare feet are very "chic" this season.

Berkshire Festival Has Good Start

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. (Special) — In spite of St. Swithin, the Berkshire Music Festival here had a most pleasant evening with which to open its twenty second season of major concerts. A hazy moon-light hung over the modest audience of some 7,000 persons who turned up to welcome back Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the celebrated Saarinen Music Shed. Conservation piece was the new sound-stage that has been constructed in the shed since last year. Semicircular in shape and with a slightly raked staged, it is enclosed by a series of panels made of triangular segments, the interlacing lines of which give a kind of prismatic decor.

Strange Impression

Above the orchestra is a canopy, also of triangular segments stretching out toward the audience and giving the strange and slightly troubling impression of a flight of huge bats winging from the mouth of a cavern. The whole business is painted a medium grey and seems a little overpowering. But since it succeeds in its purpose, which is to carry the sound farther out not only into the house but the audience sitting on the surrounding lawns, one may put up with the visual effect.

New here, too, was one of the works on the program, and new works are not offered the customers very often. The work was Bohuslav Marinu's "Three Parables," composed in 1957-58. Each bears a motto taken from French authors. Edited down, they say roughly: (1) A sculptor made a face in clay, and you, walking by, saw it and were changed. (2) In the garden I sense both life and earth as the flowers grow and fade; there is no oppression, but just the pleasure of change. And (3) Theseus, in the Labyrinth, vanquishes the Minotaur, but it vanquished by a girl.

New Mystique

This is more ofthe new mystique appearing in the arts in general. The texts however are hardly more stimulating than the watery meditations Materlinck. The music tends toward a similar vague seeking for the meaning of life. In from, it strongly recalls the sound and general imagery, the devices of Ravel, and occasionally the larger writing of Debussy. It is big, lush, and sonorous, which in a way seems ill-suited to the dreamlike nature of the mottoes. The best thing to do is forget these, and give over to the music, whics is rich and imposing though aymost totally devoid of anything new, striking or seizing.

Mr. Munch and the orchestra performed it in more or less a straight-forward manner. The playing was poised and sufficiently energetic. Mr. Munch seemed to give it more care than inspiration, and seeing what he had to work with, even though it was of his own selecting, you could'nt blame him.

The concert got off the mark with the Overture to Berlioz "Le Corsaire," upon which Mr. Munch flung the orchestra headlong, and that is mostly the way they played it for the first few pages. After that, the reading and performance steadied off to a straitly energetic account of a not very exciting score.

Sixth Symphony

The evening closed with the Extra Symphony Tschaikowsky. Mr. Munch read it with great tumult inthe more turbulent areas, and these were highly dramatic on the ear and senses. The more lyric and graceful sections of the symphony were set out in a more commenplace fashion however. The performance was excellent except for passages here and there where Mr. Munch demanded an uncomfortably high tempo.

He still often asks for more than an orchestra can securely deliver.

Tchaikovsky Works Open Main Series at Tanglewood

By Harold Rogers

LENOX, Mass., July 18.—The major series of the Berkshire Music Festival's twenty-second season got under way last night at Tanglewood when Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony in the first of three concerts devoted mainly to the music of Tchaikovsky.

A good-sized audience was on hand although the crowds won't really arrive until today and tomorrow. Dr. Munch opened with a galloping performance of the Berlioz "Corsaire" overture.

This season the music shed is adorned with the new Saarinen acoustical canopy, a handsome construction that should become basic equipment for all open-air festivals. Some critics have firmly held that music should be heard within four walls. At Tanglewood the sound now has an indoor effect while being heard outdoors; the focus is so fine that an occasional flub in the brass section does not go unnoticed.

Does "The Parables"

After the Berlioz, Dr. Munch continued with "The Parables" by Bohuslav Martinu, an extraordinary composition that took on poignant overtones when it was learned that the composer is in precarious health. A tape made of this performance will be flown to him.

"The Parables" is dedicated to Dr. Munch, who commissioned it. First heard in Boston last season, and later in New York, this three-movement piece draws its inspiration from two parables by Saint-Exupery and a third by Neveux. Each parable—of a sculpture, of a garden, and of a labyrinth—incloses a fragile mood; and Martinu has the musical gift to discern these moods and to elucidate them in diaphanous sound. He has the Bartokian ability to listen to his muse with unspoiled ears and to draw forth a kind of cosmic harmony. One might classify "The Parables" as romantic impressionism with a mid-century touch, but words can never do more than show us a musical tapestry from the backside. The riches of Martinu's tone colors can be appreciated only in the hearing.

Speedier Tempos

Most of us have long since learned that it is useless to expect Dr. Munch to give us the thoroughly Russian and palpitating Tchaikovsky that Koussevitzky used to give us. Dr. Munch desentimentalizes Tchaikovsky, which in some people's books might not be considered at all a bad thing.

Most of us, too, have resigned ourselves to Dr. Munch's speedier tempos for Beethoven and Tchaikovsky. What we have learned is that regardless of the liberties taken, Dr. Munch is seldom less than exciting; his very electricity covers a multitude of sins.

So it was when he conducted Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony Friday night. We were not bathed in bathos, and one could unblushingly let his heart soar with the oh-so-familiar melodies. Dr. Munch's reading drew forth a warm response from the listeners. If many of us do not approach Tchaikovsky today with any great degree of enthusiasm, most of us will probably admit that he is not so bad when we are actually listening to him.

That program will include Weber's "Oberon" Overture and the "Violin Concerto" of Tchaikovsky, both conducted by Mr. Munch, and the "Symphony of Chorales," conducted by the composer, Lukas Foss. Isaac Stern will be soloist in the "Violin Concerto."

The final concert at 2:30 tomorrow afternoon will be conducted by Pierre Monteux. Scheduled for performance at that time are excerpts from "Coq d'Or," by Rimsky-Korsakov; "Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy; "Symphony on a Mountain Air," by D'Indy, and the "Symphony No. 5" of Tchaikovsky.

"Most Happy Fella" Scores at Arundel

By Alfred W. Burke

LOWELL—"The Most Happy Fella," a true masterpiece of the American theater, provided a terrific opening of this week's activity at the Arundel Opera theater in Kennebunkport. Chapin Davis who stepped in for Wesley Boynton in the role of Tony, and Victoria White as Rosabella headed the cast.

This score, now known to thousands of American show fans will never lose its fascination or touch of human emotions and shortcomings. "Fella" has that something that attracts, and the cast on this occasion, though quite young, gave it a marvelous touch of maturity.

Chapin Davis has learned well from the excellent coaching and experience of Wesley Boynton. He approached his performance poised, in the dramatic sense, and also contributed some fine singing. For a young artist he has much to offer and provided one of the best performances of the season at Arundel.

Miss White was well cast and essayed her portions of the performances with understanding and carefully developed stage business.

TO US, THE finest voice in the entire cast was Susan Blumer who was a true to type Marie. She acted well, but it remained for her singing to score the success she attained. Here is a fine voice, and one when completely technically controlled in the lower register, could carry her far in the musical theater.

Ronald Gerbrands who is a real veteran of the summer circuit appeared as Joe. As in the past, he provided many of the production's finest moments.

Anthea De Forest as Cleo; Jim Wilson as Herman, and the musical joys provided by Charles Hurst (Guiseppe); Graham Wright (Pasquale) and Samuel Gilbert Ciccio), brought down the house several times.

Morse Haithwaite at the organ, and conducting; Clayton Henderson and Donald Jenkins at the duo pianos provided an excellent instrumental support to the proceedings. The dance numbers, stage sets, lighting and costumes all added up to a top flight production.

Eileen Farrell, noted dramatic soprano of opera, concert and TV, who will head the talent list in the 1959-60 Community Concert series in Lowell, is scheduled to appear on a coast-to-coast TV program Sunday evening over CBS starting at 8 o'clock. Miss Farrell who has achieved success in both German and Italian opera as well as the entire repertoire of Lieder and Art song will on this occasion appear in three contrasting roles. The setting will be picturesque Spoleto, Italy.

SUNDAY'S PROGRAM at the Berkshire festival at Tanglewood will be the Boston Symphony orchestra under the baton of the eminent conductor emeritus of the Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux. His program will include excerpts from "Coq d'Or (Rimsky-Korsakov); Afternoon of a Faun (Debussy); Symphony on a Mountain Air, with Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, pianist, (D'Indy) and the Symphony No. 5 (Tchaikovsky).

Next Wednesday evening at 8:30 the chamber music concert will be played by the celebrated Bel Arte trio and Ralph Berkowitz, pianist, in a program that will include Beethoven's Trio Op. 9, No. 3; Rivier's Trio and Brahms' Piano Quartet Op. 25. The Berkshire Music Center orchestra will play at the Thursday evening concert.

The popular musical, "Wish You Were Here" will continue into next week at the North Shore Music theater. The unusual stage settings that include a swimming pool and bathing beauty contest make "Wish You Were Here" a stage show that is really different.

Opening Wednesday at the Arundel Opera theater in Kennebunkport, Me., will be "M'sieur Fledermaus." The superb and ever loved music of Strauss should make Arundel one of the most popular straw hat trail stops on the calendar. Arundel continues to pace the Maine coastline circuit.

Music: Boston Symphony At Tanglewood

By RAYMOND. MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The first of four weekends of Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened last night in the music shed, Tanglewood.

Remaining almost entirely cloistered in safe territory, the program zigzagged from an overture by Belioz to a contemporary work by Bohuslav Marinu to Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony The "Pathetique." There was an audience of 7,696.

Charles Munch conducted the full orchestra, as contrasted to a smaller unit that just played two weekends of music by Bach and Mozart, in the theater concert hall.

Apart from its natural glamor, Tanglewood has acquired a bright sheen from its new stage canopy, consisting of 67 triangular plywood panels, connected tip to tip and suspended from roof tresses.

From Outer Space

The shell it replaces has been used since the first Berkshire Symphonic Festival 25 years ago. The new structure looks like something from outer space and extends over some 25 rows of the audience.

Much the same format of programming exists again this year. Each weekend will showcase the music of a different composer.

Last night's program opened with the foolproof "Corsair" overture, Opus 21, of Berlioz, went on to rougher soil of Martinu's "The Parables," and wound up in a blaze of lament and glory with the Tchaikovsky "Pathetique."

Focal point of interest was, of course, the Martinu. It was commissioned by Munch, is dedicated to him, and was premiered by him in Boston during the past season. The three movements are titled "The Parable of a Sculpture," "The Parable of a Garden," and "The Parable of a Labyrinth."

Dramatic Work

One could easily get snowed under or bowled over by the Martinu sounds, especially if he is vulnerable to the Bohemian's music impact. It's a dramatic work, startling, and unpredictable.

The "Sculpture" parable has gentility affected by a murkiness of sound. Occasionally themes come out into the open. It has moments of poetic agitation, spurred on in the percussion section, leading to odd effects, mostly of tonal color.

Whatever mysticism is suggested in the first part becomes a reality in the "Garden" section. It lies midway between the romantic politeness of Chabrier and the irrepresibility of Ravel —without having the rhythmic directness of the former, nor the orchestral ingenuity of the latter.

Brusk, Boisterous

The third movement (Labrynith) is brusk, declarative, and boisterous in spots. It stomps without qualms, most times with savagery. This carnival of sound is interrupted by some beautiful solos in woodwinds and lush melodies, presumably of Bohemian origin.

One should hear the Martinu more than once — and having heard it once, would wish to hear it again.

Berlioz' "Corsair" got off to a harshly - brilliant opening, ameliorated quickly by expressively warm solos in strings — langorous and slightly restless. There was fine synchronization of bowing during the agitated passages, although brass tone was heavy with penetration.

Crash-Bang Finish

The overture galloped for all it was worth to a crash-bang finish, for which the audience pounded its applause.

Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" received a streamlined performance, which doesn't mean that it was devoid of passion or compassion.

The Munch interpretation placed heavy emphasis on melody, sometimes with competition between strings and brasses in the first movement — and a waltz of the utmost grace for the second.

No more poignant lament could have been extracted from the finale. In fact, it was more than slightly reminiscent of the Koussevitzky treatment.

Tonight's Program

Tonight's program follows the same guarantee of a palatable first and last course. Munch will conduct the orchestra in Weber's "Oberon" overture and the Tchaikovsky violin concerto with Isaac Stern as soloist. Lukas Foss will be conductor for his "Symphony of Chorals, for Orchestra."

Check of Weekend Business Sounds Happy Note in County

Cash registers at Berkshire tourist facilities rang a happy tune over the weekend as nature and culture drew thousands of visitors to these hills.

John F. Downing, executive director of the Berkshire Hills Conference, area promotional agency, said the weekend was the biggest of the season. Mr. Downing said a spot check by his office indicates that the vacation-travel business here is up over last year.

If Tanglewood attendance is any barometer, the Berkshires' 1959 summer tourist business is challenging previous highs. Total attendance at the weekend concerts —first of the four major weekends at Tanglewood—was 27,368.

During the same weekend last year, Tanglewood drew only 23,776 customers. In 1957 Tanglewood drew 27,480 during its first major week end, and in 1956, 18,951. A rainy Saturday cut down the attendance last year.

eeeee At Music Barn in Lenox, now in the fourth week of a 10-week season, attendance is up from 20 to 25 per cent over the same period last year, according to Mrs. Stephanie Barber. She also reported a complete sellout of rooms at Music Inn over the weekend and heavy advance reservations for this week.

Jacob's Pillow, another major cultural attraction in the Berkshires, had a good weekend, with two sellout performances Saturday, but the Pillow's total attendance is down slightly from 1958.

Pillow Slightly Down

The Pillow will open the fourth week of its nine-week season tomorrow. Harold Abbey, public relations director for the Pillow, said attendance was down slightly during the first two weeks, and last week stayed even with 1958.

"Our advance bookings were four times better than last year," said Mr. Abbey, "and we had hoped that this would also follow in box office sales. However, this hasn't been the case yet."

Mr. Downing said the weekend crowd was boosted considerably by the fact that it was the first of several so-called "parent weekends" at area summer camps.

In its spot check of the county, the Berkshire Hills Conference came up with the following reports:

Elwal Pines Motel and Inn, Williamstown: room business very good; way ahead of last year; new dining room filled to capacity throughout the weekend.

Wigwam Motel, Mohawk Trail: business good, traffic very heavy.

Hotel Wendell-Sherwood, Pittsfield: exceeded house figures for any weekend during past two years; Saturday smorgasbord so crowded management is looking for ways to expand facilities.

Jug End Barn, South Egremont: business "terrific," far ahead of last year.

Williams Inn, Williamstown: the season really "woke up" this weekend; far ahead of last year.

Curtis Hotel, Lenox: business very good; way ahead of last year.

Red Lion Inn, Stockbridge: hit 107 per cent of capacity over weekend; had to put in extra cots.

Crane Inn, Dalton: very good; dining room business excellent.

Area Teacher In 2nd Year At Berkshire

David Perkett of 3983 Albany street, instructor of wind instruments at Colonie Central high school, is spending his second year at the Berkshire Music Center, the school of music maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., during the Berkshire Festival season.

PERKETT, a graduate of Ithaca College School of Music, obtained a bachelor of science in music education there in 1958.

This year Perkett found that he was expected to give a near professional performance just four days after arriving at sion that a heavy schedule was Tanglewood. Each of the 300 students found at the opening sesprepared for them for the six week term.

For three hours each morning Perkett and some 75 of his fellow students prepare for the weekly concerts of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra.

THE STUDENTS are under the direction of Eleazar de Carvalho, eminent Brazilian conductor and himself a former student at Tanglewood. Perkett's after lunch schedule calls for two rehearsals of different chamber works for presentation at the Sunday morning chamber music concerts. The remainder of the afternoon is devoted to practice and recreation, perhaps a swim at the Tanglewood beach on Lake Mahkennac. Evenings are devoted to concerts, either participating or listening.

The day is full as Perkett and other students find themselves engulfed in the Tanglewood philosophy of "Living and working in Music."

27,000 Jam Opening Of Berkshire Festival

By D. F. RITZ
Gazette Music Editor

A total of 27,363 persons attended the three concerts of the first weekend of shed concerts in the Berkshire Festival series at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

CHARLES MUNCH conducted the Friday and Saturday evening events with Isaac Stern as soloist in the Tchaikovsky "Violin Concerto in D major, opus 35," on Saturday evening.

Pierre Monteux conducted yesterday afternoon's program, attended by 9,679 persons and featuring the young French pianist, Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer in the d'Indy "Symphony for Orchestra and Pianoforte on a French Mountain Song, opus 25."

YESTERDAY'S PROGRAM included the Rimsky-Korsakov "Introduction and Wedding March from 'le Coq o'Or'"; the Debussy "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune" and the Tchaikovsky "Symphony number 5, in E minor, opus 64."

The Friday evening program opened with the Berlioz "Overture, 'The Corsaire" and included Martinu's "The Parables" and the Tchaikovsky "Symphony number 6 'Pathetique'."

The Saturday evening program in addition to the violin concerto included the Weber "Overture to 'Oberon'" and Lukas Foss "Symphony of Chorales, for Orchestra."

WE ATTENDED yesterday's program and for the first time, probably in deference to the weather, saw the Boston Symphony men playing without benefit of their white coats. In view of the weather, which was hot even on the mountain, it was a move in the right direction.

For those of us who cannot get to all concerts of the festival series the problem of choosing the programs that mean most to us as individuals looms large. We chose that of yesterday for several reasons. We are firm admirers of the conducting and the interpretations of Monteux, we wished to hear Mme. Henriot-Schweitzer and were particularly anxious to hear the d'Indy "Symphony."

THE RIMSKY-Korsakov "Golden Cockerel" music is brilliant orchestral writing and was given a brilliant performance.

The "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune" is ideal music for a hot afternoon in July — at least to listen to — it has a lazy, semi-conscious tone bordering on dream quality. The orchestra members however undoubtedly find no time for dreaming during the performance.

The d'Indy work is beautiful symphonic writing and the French Mountain song is treated in rich variations during the three movements.

The piano part is most difficult and was given magnificent interpretation by Mme. Henriot-Schweitzer. Used as an integral part of the orchestral score the piano at times is played with the percussive effect of plucked strings or achieves the growl of the basses.

There was music of a good rousing celebration; there were staccato effects on the drums and short biting strokes of the bows near the nut. The music is much too involved for a one-hearing analysis but even one hearing under the baton of Monteux and with Mme. Henriot-Schweitzer as soloist is an unforgettable experience.

The Tchaikovsky "Symphony number 5," so familiar, became a new work under the magic of Monteux. There is a majesty to the music that only a great orchestra and a great conductor can evoke.

More than 80 per cent of Austria is mountainous, but more than half of this is under cultivation. Agriculture employs one-third of the population.

Tchaikovsky Works Open Main Series at Tanglewood

By Harold Rogers

LENOX, Mass., July 18.—The major series of the Berkshire Music Festival's twenty-second season got under way last night at Tanglewood when Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony in the first of three concerts devoted mainly to the music of Tchaikovsky.

A good-sized audience was on hand although the crowds won't really arrive until today and tomorrow. Dr. Munch opened with a galloping performance of the Berlioz "Corsaire" overture.

This season the music shed is adorned with the new Saarinen acoustical canopy, a handsome construction that should become basic equipment for all open-air festivals. Some critics have firmly held that music should be heard within four walls. At Tanglewood the sound now has an indoor effect while being heard outdoors; the focus is so fine that an occasional flub in the brass section does not go unnoticed.

Does "The Parables"

After the Berlioz, Dr. Munch continued with "The Parables" by Bohuslav Martinu, an extraordinary composition that took on poignant overtones when it was learned that the composer is in precarious health. A tape made of this performance will be flown to him.

"The Parables" is dedicated to Dr. Munch, who commissioned it. First heard in Boston last season, and later in New York, this three-movement piece draws its inspiration from two parables by Saint-Exupery and a third by Neveux. Each parable—of a sculpture, of a garden, and of a labyrinth—incloses a fragile mood; and Martinu has the musical gift to discern these moods and to elucidate them in diaphanous sound. He has the Bartokian ability to listen to his muse with unspoiled ears and to draw forth a kind of cosmic harmony. One might classify "The Parables" as romantic impressionism with a mid-century touch, but words can never do more than show us a musical tapestry from the backside. The riches of Martinu's tone colors can be appreciated only in the hearing.

Speedier Tempos

Most of us have long since learned that it is useless to expect Dr. Munch to give us the thoroughly Russian and palpitating Tchaikovsky that Koussevitzky used to give us. Dr. Munch desentimentalizes Tchaikovsky, which in some people's books might not be considered at all a bad thing.

Most of us, too, have resigned ourselves to Dr. Munch's speedier tempos for Beethoven and Tchaikovsky. What we have learned is that regardless of the liberties taken, Dr. Munch is seldom less than exciting; his very electricity covers a multitude of sins.

So it was when he conducted Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony Friday night. We were not bathed in bathos, and one could unblushingly let his heart soar with the oh-so-familiar melodies. Dr. Munch's reading drew forth a warm response from the listeners. If many of us do not approach Tchaikovsky today with any great degree of enthusiasm, most of us will probably admit that he is not so bad when we are actually listening to him.

Fine Response By Musicians To Tanglewood Directors

The Boston Symphony Orchestra rose en masse to greet Dr. Munch at the first concert using its full complement in the music shed at Tanglewood in the Berkshires.

The third series of the Berkshire Festival featured the composer Tschaikowsky on each of its programs.

Friday evening a stunning performance of Berlioz' "Corsair" Overture opened the concert; this was perfection in all musical facets, each musician obviously unaffected by the weather's oppressiveness.

A new work of Bohislav Martinu entitled "The Parables" followed, highly inventive and evocative in its contained tonal range. The first two movements entitled "Parable of a Garden" are taken from a posthumous work of Saint-Exupery "Citadelle"; the plasticity of the sculpture is smoothly drawn and the growth and abundance of the garden apparent. The third "Parable of a Labyrinth" from "Voyage de Thesee" was fascinating to follow through its maze of moods.

With the "Pathetique of Tschaikowsky interpreted by Dr. Munch with an expressive clarity that transcends any overemotional display the orchestra completed a program that transported the listeners into prolonged outbursts of delight.

Saturday evening's concert opened with Weber's lively and romantic "Oberon" Overture, the horns full-throated and in excellent tone.

Lukas Foss conducted his latest work, "Symphony of Chorales" for orchestra; cleverly contrived for chorale tunes of Bach its variegated medium of transmission is so construed that only bits and patches stand forth, the whole cloth never closely woven, the strident coloring almost humorous in conception; one musician was heard to call it "spoiled Stravinsky." Perhaps longer and more careful rehearsing would clarify the piece, even the conductor seemed to overburden himself with countless dynamic changes and at times seemed at metric variance with the music.

Isaac Stern was the exponent of Tschaikowsky, playing his prodigious violin Concerto in D major. Expressive vigor was lacking in the first movement and part of the second, the concentration on sound seemed to occupy the artist, but with the Andante the nuances began to flow and the Finale was brilliant. Though the whole was disappointing in interpretation, one cannot question Mr. Stern's technical virtuosity.

Again the orchestra rose to greet their conductor, but Sunday afternoon the homage was for the venerable Pierre Monteux, in his first appearance this summer.

Without score, he commended the responsive musicians through a program of pleasantly assimilated works. The picturesque Introduction and Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or" by Rimsky-Korsakoff and Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune," provocative and delicate were performed with fine sensitivity.

The rarely heard "Symphony for Orchestra and Pianoforte on a French Mountain Air" proved to be a delightful choice for the humid afternoon. Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer in her second appearance at Tanglewood was the soloist, her powerfully executed arpeggios and runs colorfully and expertly blended with the orchestra and solo instruments. This cyclic symphony with its wandering Alpine airs shone with a translucence one hoped for in the weather.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in Eminor, with its vivdly contrastng movements, its expansive moods found Mr. Monteux, with his carefully frugal indications again the composer's apostle, the orchestra quick to interpret his simple yet forceful desires. The lengthy finale caught the audience applauding before the final outburst, but with the actual climax the appreciation was thunderous and prolonged, for both orchestra and Mr. Monteux.

Next weekend's concert will feature Brahms, with a memoriam concert on Saturday including a work by Ernest Block, the recently deceased composer and conductor.

FOSS SYMPHONY SUPERBLY DONE AT TANGLEWOOD

Composer Directs Orchestra; Isaac Stern Also Brilliant

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX — Lukas Foss had hi hour in the spotlight of the Berk shire Music Festival Saturda night when the Boston Symphon Orchestra played his "Symphon of Chorales, for Orchestra" ur der his direction. The work i based on four Bach chorales but it is still a question as t whether Mr. Foss has done Bac and these chorales a service Primarily, he has extended th chorales and attempten to re flect their texts musically.

This is not a symphony to b written off after a single hear ing. At its worst it is frenzied noisy and incoherent. At it best, as for example, in the in termezzo, it is tender, affection ate and the chorale is easily discernable. The little episode in which the mandolin holds forth is utterly charming. All in all, a single hearing of this work finds in it many of the ingredients which might make a fine cake, but the cake never really rises. The work was given a superb performance by the Boston players and Mr. Foss directed surely.

Lucious Tone

Foss was not the only luminary on hand Saturday night. There was Isaac Stern to play the Tschaikowsky violin concerto under the direction of Charles Munch. The time element made it necessary for us to hear the morning rehearsal for the work as the concluding number of Saturday night's program. As usual Stern was in superb form, playing with the luscious tone and rhythmic incisiveness which characterizes his playing. There were moments when the orchestra seemed a bit heavy, but most of the harmonics got through and the new canopy again proved its value. Both soloist and conductor stressed the beauty of the concerto without over sweetening it. It was a straight-forward interpretation, musical and, at times, exciting.

The program opened with a rather deliberate reading of the overture to "Oberon" by Weber. This tried and true piece for orchestra was handsomely realized and the Boston strings were at their best. Again one noticed how the new canopy brings out each choir and how kind it is to the brasses and winds.

There was an estimated 10,00 people on hand for this concer Figures thus far indicate tha attendance to date is greate than last season. Pleasan weather conditions have helpe

This afternoon at 2.30 p. m. th beloved Pierre Monteux wi mount the podium to direct th orchestra in works by Rimsk Korsakoff, Debussy and Tschail owsky. Nicole Heniot-Schweitze will be the pianist in th "Symphony on a Mountain Air by D'Indy. Tschaikowsky Fifth Symphony will conclud the program.

Music: Weekend Concert At Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Weber and Tchaikovsky salvaged what would have otherwise been an imposition on the time of audience of 9,988 last night at Tanglewood.

This was the second concert in the first series of weekend programs of the Berkshire Music Festival. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was conducted by Charles Munch and Lukas Foss.

Incredible Nerve

The highly offensive "music" was Foss' symphony of Chorales, for orchestra, allegedly based on four chorales by Johann Sebastian Bach. The composer, Foss, drove the orchestra through the four movements with a baton and incredible nerve.

Movement I (Toccata) sounds like a mad session in a Balinese aviary no rime or reason — nothing engaging to hear other than a series of unpleasant surprises. That Bach's name should be associated with this nonsense is the greatest surprise of all, unless it's for purposes of Martyrdom.

Anyhow, the thing raised a whoping racket for what seemed an eternity. As at the end of all four movements, there was a murmur of — let's be charitable and call it "astonishment."

Little Interest

The second movement (andante Sostenuto) slinks about with suggestions of melody that stir up a kind of Latin-American rhythm that couldn't extricate itself from the mire.

Foss calls the third movement a "respite," which it isn't — at least psychologically. It tries ever so hard to be bucolic —plucks at strings and gambols through the woodwinds and gets exactly nowhere. The last movement pounds, bellows, hammers, spits out sound, rants, raves and dies an unnatural death, after a silly little solo in mandolin.

There may be some ulterior goal, or hidden inspiration, or symbolism, or satire to this music of Foss. If there is, it escaped us completely, and we feel resonably safe in including the large majority of the audience.

If it was meant as a tribute or memorial to Bach, we offer that long departed gentleman our sincere condolences.

Tenderly Euphonious

Munch conducted the orchestra in the "Oberon" overture of Weber. Opening passages were tenderly euphonious — those in brasses had that "far-away" effect that the new canopy in the music shed is capable of producing.

From the overture's rapid transition with a stomped on chord, it was pretty heavy-handed playing that seemed, in restrospect, like gentle whispers from Shangri-La once Foss opus got underway.

Just as interesting as last night's performance of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto — and possibly more so — was Stern's rehearsal yesterday morning with the orchestra and Munch.

These Saturday morning rehearsals are open to the public, for a one dollar admission, the proceeds of which go to the orchestra's pension fund.

As in past performances of the Tchaikovsky by Stern here at Tanglewood, it was clear from the start that his interest in the work is primarily a virtuosic display and a kind of soul-searching tone for the second movement.

Miscalculation

There was but one actual stop at rehearsal and that presumably was due to a miscalculation by the conductor. There was also some "by-lay" when oboeist Ralph Gomberg deliberately "hammed up" one of the emotional phrases of the last movement. It caused some "Schmaltz" from several directions to the amusement of some 3,796 listeners.

Stern injected much fire into the opening movement, without achieving that happy state of completely accurate intonation. It was technically brilliant playing, and sturdily affixed to the orchestral background. In spite of Stern's dazzling technique, the first movement did not overpower. At times the tone was a mite scratchy.

Softly Cushioned

The slow movement had plenty of emotion without sentimentality. It was resplendently toned in the solo instrument and softly cushioned by the orchestra.

In the finale, Stern attempted to display little more than a technical splurge. The slow respites in woodwinds were more like breathers than equally important components of the text. It ended in a mad race to the finish line.

This afternoon's program by the Boston Symphony will be conducted by Pierre Monteux. It fulfills the weekend's Tchaikovsky trade-mark with the Fifth Symphony. Also the introduction and wedding march from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Golden Cockerell," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and D'Indy's Symphony on a French Mountain Air," with pianist Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer.

THE SPRINGFIELD UNION

9679 AT LENOX FOR PROGRAM BY MONTEUX

Turnout Boosts Total to 27,363 at Tanglewood For Week End

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX — Pierre Monteux, making his first appearance at the Berkshire Music Festival Sunday afternoon, provided 9679 listeners with an afternoon of lovely melodies. Whether it was the music of Debussy, Dindy or Tschaikowsky, every note fell caressingly upon the ear.

Ahead of '58

The first week-end of shed concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra drew an attendance of 27,363 persons during the three programs. Attendance figures are ahead of 1958 and the weather is much, much better than last season.

Mr. Monteux is ageless. Now in his 80's, he moves slowly and conducts with disarming ease. The response of the men, who seem to adore him, is instantaneous and every number emerges in as near a perfect state as could be asked. All this without any fuss or theatrics. It can be done.

The program opened with a stunning performance of the introduction and wedding march from "The Golden Cock" by Rimsky-Korsakoff. How beautifully the hymn to the sun was uttered and what gaity and youthful energy abound in this music.

Flutist Applauded

Then came one of the most polished performances of Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" we have ever heard. It had the sheen of satin and the fantasy and sensuousness of the true mallarme. Mr. Monteux took particular pains to bring flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer to the front to acknowledge the applause for her exquisite playing. One hears only rarely a performance so perfectly within its frame.

The French pianist Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer made her second appearance during this festival, playing the piano in Dindy's "Symphony for Orchestra and Piano on a French Mountain Song." Here is another work rich in melody and intriguing rhythmic patterns.

There are those who regard the work more as a piano concerto than symphony with piano, but fundamentally it is what the composer intended with the piano integral in the orchestral development and quite free from displayful passages.

As in her Mozart appearance, Mme. Schweitzer was in fine form, playing brilliantly, but always within the orchestral coloring. It was a very fine performance, carefully detailed, rich in nuance and true to the spirit of the Alpine song which is its basis.

I don't know how many times Monteux has conducted Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5, but Sunday afternoon the music emerged as fresh and thrilling as the day it was written. All this was accomplished with an effortless discipline which carried the orchestra even beyond its superb best.

We have seen conductors get into near hysteria without getting more out of an orchestra than Monteux did. He has today the rewards of a dedicated life filled with matchless experiences.

In Brief . . .

Few locations outside the city's business center could be more convenient than the Wahconah Street property optioned as a site for the second low-rent housing-for-the-elderly project. Besides being near two churches and a little shopping center, it is right on a bus (or jitney) line . . . Because weather has such a decisive effect on Tanglewood attendance, it would be misleading to stress the fact that the 27,000 attendance at the weekend concerts was well ahead of last year's corresponding figure. But at least it shows the interest is there, if the weather will continue to cooperate . . . A more significant fact, perhaps, is the steady growth in attendance at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Saturday morning pension fund rehearsals. Last Saturday's crowd more than half-filled the Shed, indicating that more and more music-lovers know a bargain when they hear it . . .

The "North Berkshire Weekly" and "South Berkshire Weekly" findings that roadside business is picking up on the older state highways, despite the Massachusetts Turnpike, helps reassure merchants who shudder every time planning for a new superhighway is mentioned . . . The speed with which the E. D. Jones plant in Dalton is going up, after the ground-breaking only a few months ago, is one of those near-miracles of modern construction . . .

Tchaikovsky, Foss at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE LAST brace of concerts of the third weekend at Tanglewood, marking the halfway point in the season, was divided between conductors Charles Munch and guest Pierre Monteux leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra in programs basically devoted to the music of Tchaikovsky.

Yesterday afternoon Monteux closed his program with the fifth symphony, and was accorded an ovation which lasted minutes long. The venerable Monteux gives a minimum of visible gestures. The orchestra plays for him with their best esprit de corps. Monteux asked Doriot Anthony Dwyer to stand after the Debussy "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune" and James Stagliano after the Tchaikovsky symphony to accept recognition for their flute and French horn solos respectively. He might also have asked Louis Speyer to stand after his English horn introductory sentence in D'Indy's a "Symphony on a French Mountain Air" in which the piano soloist was Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer.

The pianist's role in the D'Indy work is more as a member of the orchestral ensemble than real soloist yet Miss Henriot contributed more than her share to the happy performance of D'Indy's engaging development of the lovely mountain song. The concert had started with the Introduction and Wedding March from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Le Coq d'Or."

SATURDAY NIGHT Munch opened his program with the overture to "Oberon" of Weber, and then gave the podium to young composer Lukas Foss for his Symphony of Chorales, for orchestra. After intermission Munch resumed his post with Isaac Stern as soloist in the Tchaikovsky violin concerto. He gave the soloist alert and wonderfully agile support, two attributes which are not only always most creditable, but, in the case of Saturday night, doubly so for Stern was bent on making his wizardry with his instrument a vehicle for display rather than one for expressive music making.

Stern's magnificent large tone and mastery of the violin do not permit anything but arresting fiddling, but he was not in one of his most distinguished moments and, as for the finale, "vivacissimo" is clear enough Italian but it was not clear enough violin playing. Munch has led orchestras in the accompaniment of this concerto with probably every eminent violinist of the day. The orchestra has played it with an imposing list right here in Tanglewood, and each one vies with the other to exceed the speed limit in the home stretch.

A MASS of jumbled testimony has accumulated relating to the alleged rejection of the concerto by Leopold Auer for the reason that he considered it too difficult and unplayable. Standards of violin playing have changed in the last two generations, and Auer's pupils were among the foremost exponents of this concerto in later years. Within this reviewer's hearing the venerated Kreisler once gave his views on this concerto to the soloist on a previous occasion, and he was speaking then as a knowledgeable member of the audience rather than as a performer. His admonishments concerned the control of the tempo. However, the audience was contrary-minded for they were eager to release all their controls in evincing their enthusiasm for the performance.

IT WAS a coincidence that so many of the works on the three weekend programs should have been derived from literary sources. Berlioz turned to Byron, Martinu to Saint-Exupery and Georges Neveux, Debussy to Mallarmé, D'Indy to a folk-tune, and Foss to Bach chorales with their religious background.

Foss is a serious music scholar and can explain and justify his theories and approach more lucidly and convincingly than most musicians. He also is an explorer. He took the tunes of four Bach chorales, not the harmonies, and on their sacred connotations developed four contrasting movements which together comprise a symphony. There is a reference in the fourth to an idiom in the first chorale. Otherwise each is distinct but conforms to the usual juxtaposition of symphony movements.

YET A WIDER divergence of musical expression and of spirit and of means could not be imagined. The intricacy of the first movement is followed by a sustained andante of antipodal placidity, then comes a delightfully calm Sicilienne and a final movement gay in concept, syncopated and almost ebullient.

There is no respite in the first movement for anyone and the interwoven long strands weave a tapestry of boldness in which the overall design is not discernible on little acquaintence. Foss has a wonderful sense of the use of instruments. There are anvils, bells and cymbals used as we never heard them before and his grandiose imagination builds up to a sort of charivari. Unbelievably though, it requires little persuasion to be convinced this is expressive of religious conviction.

IN THE SECOND movement the mood is simple and penitent but Foss built one amazing orchestral climax in which he depicted, for us, the vast awe he conceived that one might experience on arriving at some celestial portal, or, if more terrestially, at a first view of the Grand Canyon or its equivalent.

Following this almost elementary harmonic pattern, by comparison, Foss turns to a credible and easy polytonality in the third movement. He makes use of a mandolin here. The final chord is a happy, peaceful cluster. In the last movement whole tone scales lead to a conclusion with cathedral proportions. The composer's conducting was superlatively competent.

Music Review

First of the 'Big' Concerts

By JAY ROSENFELD

"LA GRANDE SAISON" of Tanglewood began Friday when the big and complete Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the first of the major four weekends in the great Shed. For the first two weeks, the orchestra had been divided into a chamber ensemble here while the larger portion remained in Boston for the Esplanade concerts. On Friday they were united, and Charles Munch led them in a program of Berlioz' overture "The V Corsaire," Martinu's "The Parables" and the Tchaikowsky B minor symphony, No. 6.

WHO IN POETRY today moves men to extravagant emulation or incites composers to rush to their music paper to set down the expression in their medium of their romantic ideas as Byron did a century and a half ago? Berlioz' "Corsaire" was Byron, although as the overture starts, it may as well be Icarus taking off on an irresponsible flight into everywhere. That Berlioz was roused by Byron is not surprising, for they both felt themselves privileged, almost authorized, to prey upon individuals and the public at large in their mock-heroic way.

BERLIOZ, no matter whether he thought of Byron before writing or, on re-examination, found that what he had wrought fitted the spirit of Byron, wrote an overture so unrestrained that it takes one right out of his seat from the outset. It's an audacious and a confident conductor who dares ask his musicians for such a meteor of brilliance as the Boston Symphony players gave Munch last night in response to his galvanic direction.

Bohuslav Martinu dedicated his "Parables" to Munch. He, too, took his inspiration from literature — from Saint-Exupery for the first two, the parable of a Sculpture and of a Garden, and from Neveux the third, the parable of a Labyrinth. The title becomes a personal matter and whether it is discernible to all is debatable. Berlioz had taken the same license with his "Corsaire" title, for the music served under several titles before he settled on the one now used. But the "Parables" have a paragraph at the head of each movement, as a sort of motto, and program music may mean many things to many people. Indeed, the term "Pathetique" was applied to the Tchaikowsky, symphony with which the program ended, but its appropriateness is always questioned for, although it presents movements of profound pathos, this is by no means the prevailing mood of the symphony.

MARTINU is not a pioneer and is content to use previously devised formulas to express his individual musical ideas and he creates some lovely harmonies and textures. One may listen and try to adjust the music as he hears it to the suggestions of the composer, or he may allow his own imagination to carry him aloft or afar on the wings of Martinu's songs. The parables quoted serve as much to confuse as to clarify the music for us and we were happy to listen to it as a fresh conception. On that basis, it stands up well and substantially.

It is virtually a symphony in three movements with the treatment little differentiated in the three moods. He does not call for an extremely large orchestra, but he has sufficient to create some magnificent orchestral colors.

MUNCH MADE the "Pathetique" a symphony of splendor. From the first ominous bassoon phrase to the culmination of the sentence in the magnificent viola section of the orchestra was a lifetime and more of musical expressiveness rarely exceeded. Munch was in his most expansive mood and left us in suspense at some points where we thought we would never again regain our breath, but he always resumed. The orchestra was in its most toneful and virtuoso glory.

Weekend Concerts at Tanglewood—

Isaac Stern, Nicole Henriot in Solo Roles

By Harold Rogers

Lenox, Mass.

Charles Munch opened the main series of the 22d Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood Friday night; and while the weekend programs featured the music of Tchaikovsky, two contemporary composers — Bohuslav Martinů and Lukas Foss — were represented, the former by his "Parables," the latter by his "Chorales."

The weather was close to ideal, and the numbers of Tanglewood visitors can almost be predicted in terms of weather. Tanglewood, aside from its management, can no longer be said to be a New England institution. The audiences now consist almost entirely of New Yorkers. Evidently New Englanders have long since satisfied their curiosity about Tanglewood, and few of them care to make the effort involved to hear programs that have been played in Boston during the winter season.

Some critics have held that music, for acoustical reasons, should always be heard within four walls. But with the new Saarinen acoustical canopy at Tanglewood the problem of hearing outdoor music with an indoor sound has apparently been solved. Now there is little dispersion; the music is so clearly focused that minor flaws in the playing come glaringly forth. A relaxed summer attitude on behalf of the Boston Symphony musicians will no longer be passable. This Saarinen canopy should become basic equipment for all open-air festivals.

Friday night Dr. Munch opened with a spirited reading of the Berlioz "Corsaire" Overture, which he followed with Martinů's extraordinary composition, "The Parables." It will be recalled by those listeners who have heard it in Boston that the movements are devoted to three modern parables—the first two by Saint-Exupéry, the third by Neveux.

Each embodies a fragile mood, and Martinů has the gift to discern these moods and to express them in diaphanous sound. He can listen to his muse with unspoiled ears and draw forth a kind of cosmic harmony. His "Parables" might be classified as romantic impressionism with a midcentury touch, but mere words can never describe the riches of his tonal colors. They can be appreciated only in the hearing.

Most of us have long since learned that Dr. Munch's way with Tchaikovsky does not always follow tradition, and many of us would probably agree that his ability to de-sentimentalize Tchaikovsky is commendable. So it was when he conducted the "Pathétique" Symphony. We were not bathed in bathos, and one could unblushingly let his heart soar with the oh-so-familiar melodies.

Saturday night when Lukas Foss conducted his Symphony of Chorales, it proved to be the same eclectic and uninteresting work that it was when heard last winter in Boston. It was Isaac Stern whose playing stands forth in memory. Accompanied by Dr. Munch and the orchestra, he gave an impassioned traversal of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto.

His way with the Canzonetta was especially wonderful, with a rubato here and there that was no more than a sigh. As for virility of tone and accuracy of technique, Mr. Stern can hardly be surpassed. His audience responded with rapturous applause.

Pierre Monteux took his benign place on the podium for the Sunday afternoon concert, and the musicians gave him of their best when he opened with the brilliant Introduction and Wedding March of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Le Coq d'Or."

It would be difficult to choose a more appropriate selection than Debussy's "Prélude à l'Après-midi d'un Faune" for the afternoon at Tanglewood. Sunny and warm, with a slight breeze fanning the trees, nature blended with Debussy in an ideal union.

The Berkshires were also an ideal setting for Vincent d'Indy's Symphony for Orchestra and Piano on a French Mountain Song. Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer has recorded this with the Boston Symphony, and it was she who gave another of her scintillating performances yesterday. She, too, won an ecstatic ovation from the thousands on hand, after which Mr. Monteux brought the weekend to a close with Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

27,363 Drawn To Tanglewood Over Weekend For Big Shed Concerts

The big Music Shed concerts of the full Boston Symphony Orchestra began at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, over the past weekend and drew an attendance of 27,363 for the three programs. The weather and the "Berkshire nights" promotion helped roll up this large attendance figure.

Friday night Charles Munch, Boston Symphony director, led the orchestra in a program of old and new. The contemporary work, "The Parables" by Martinu, commissioned by the Boston Symphony and dedicated to Mr. Munch, had a good reception. Berloiz' "Overture to the Corsaire" opened the program, and Tschiakowsky's Pathetique Symphony was three major offering.

Saturday night the Boston Symphony played "Symphony for Chorales, for Orchestra" by Lukas Foss, with the composer conducting. Charles Munch conducted the rest of the program, with Isaac Stern playing the Tschiakowsky Violin Concerto. The Overture to "Oberon" by Weber opened the program.

Pierre Monteux, beloved Tanglewood guest conductor, made his first appearance of the season on Sunday afternoon, when he conducted the introduction and wedding march from "Coq D'Or" by Rimsky Korsakov, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun", Symphony on a French Mountain Air by D'Indy, with Mme. Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer as piano soloist, and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5.

M. Monteux will lead the orchestra again on Friday night. The program will include Passacaglia and Fugue in C Minor by Bach-Respighi, Brahms' Violin Concerto in D Minor, with Isaac Stern as soloist, Eleven Chorale Preludes, Brahms-Thomson, and "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss.

Saturday night Mr. Munch will conduct the following program: Brahms' Academic Festival Overture, Piston's Symphony No. 3, and Brahm's First Symphony. The Sunday afternoon program, also with Mr. Munch conducting, will include Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Copland's orchestra suite from "The Tender Land" and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 with Rudolph Serkin as soloist.

28,000 Hear Concerts At Tanglewood

(Special to The American)

LENOX, MASS. — The first week end of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, following the two earlier series of Bach and Mozart, drew audiences of almost 28,000 with an additional 3,600 on Saturday morning for the rehearsal open to the public.

It was a week end of fine music under perfect conditions with both conductors, Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux, leading the Boston Symphony, and Isaac Stern, violinist, and Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, pianist, appearing as soloists. Audiences Saturday evening and yesterday afternoon numbered just under 10,000 for each performance. Music of Tchaikovsky received important place on each of the three programs. Berlioz, Martinu, Debussy, and D'Indy were programmed on Friday evening and Sunday afternoon. Friday evening's audience for the opening of the four-week series in the Shed numbered 7,700 and heard Charles Munch conduct music of Berlioz, Martinu's "The Parables," and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique."

Saturday evening's concert opened with Weber's "Overture to Oberon," included Isaac Stern in a talented performance of Tchaikovsky's "Violin Concerto in D major, Op. 35" which he has played here before, and had as an added attraction Foss's "Symphony of Chorales, for Orchestra" with the composer as the conductor.

Monteux Conducts

The concert Saturday evening was well received as was yesterday afternoon's with Monteux conducting. It was a colorful performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Introduction and Wedding March from Le Coq d'Or" which the audience listened to and a fine performance by Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer as piano soloist in D'Indy's "Symphony for Orchestra and Pianoforte on a French Mountain Song, Op 25." Miss Schweitzer was heard here recently when she played during the early season with the smaller orchestra. The concluding selection was Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op 64" which brought the first week end to a triumphant close.

Included in the Saturday morning rehearsal audience were bus loads of children from various communities, including one group of 40 that included children from the Waterbury-Watertown-Torrington area. They picnicked on the grounds, toured the gardens, listened to small rehearsing groups and made their own music on the grand piano in the glass room at the entrance.

This week end it will be Monteux on Friday night with music of Strauss' "Don Juan," Stern in Brahms' "Violin Concerto," Munch conducting Brahms and Piston on Saturday evening and on Sunday it will be Serkin as piano soloist in Brahms' "Piano Concerto No. 2," Brahms' "Haydn Variations," and Copland conducting his own, "Tender Land Suite."

Music: Pierre Monteux Conducts Program

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The first weekend of Berkshire Music Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to a close yesterday afternoon with Pierre Monteux conductiog a program that demanded nary an extra measure of tolerance or indecision.

There was an audience of 9,679, bringing the weekend total to 27,363.

Yesterday's program: Introduction and Wedding March from "The Golden Cockerell" by Rimsky Korsakoff; Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of A Faun"; Vincent D'Indy's "Symphony on A French Mountain Air" with Nicole Henriot - Schweitzer as pianist; and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No 5 in E Minor, Opus 64.

Marvel to Watch

It remains a marvel to watch octogenarian Monteux conduct an orchestra.

He received a standing ovation as he came onstage and stepped onto the podium with a little extra step that's been installed for his comfort.

Two things that are quietly spectacular about the Monteux conducting are, first, his absolutely effortless, self - effacing directions that couldn't be more explicit or detailed; and second, the astuteness of his interpretations—and the gentleman conducts his scores from memory.

The pure, richness-encased tone of the Boston Symphony's string section was heard in all its glory during the Rimsky - Korsakoff and Debussy scores.

Silken sounds emerged from the "Golden Cockerell" introduction—sounds that blended beautifully with harps and elaborate cadenzas in woodwinds. Exotic, oriental melodies — surging climaxes—gala, at times austere, brilliant recitatives were the factors that generated a compelling performance of the Wedding March.

Full Regalia

It was opulent tone in full regalia.

The "Afternoon of A Faun" was highlighted by gorgeous flute solos from Doriot Anthony-Dwyer, reinforced with muted, plush effects from full orchestra. There were magnificent swells of climax, consumately controlled—yet as free as a breeze.

Seemingly, at just the right moments in the score, gusts of wind stirred the trees surrounding the music shed.

The splendid performance of D'Indy's "French Mountain Air" symphony was due in large measure to Mme. Henriot - Schweitzer's clean-cut, substantial technique. She negotiated the highly melodic and ornamental passages of the first and third movements without strain or external machinations.

The tune upon which the symphony is based was kept clearly forward, with the piano serving as one of the forces only, rather than the instrument of first display.

Brasses were quite magnificent in extolling the counterpoint of the First Movement. The slow movement was fragile but secure —and not overly-poetized. The finale combined rhapsodic qualities with elation and bravura.

The last two Movements of the Tchaikovksy Symphony were particularly gratifying. Monteux was content to develop the Third movement's almost pastoral nature. It's melodies had none of the "sing-song" with which lesser conductors try to season it.

The finale was initiated with an external sobriety that kept its bounds and led with dignity to the Grand Scale March. The speed was unusually energetic, yet sounded purposeful and unhurried. The music shed's new acoustical canopy was highly effective in hurling out the huge brass sound. Rapid passages in strings were clear as a bell.

And bless the timpanist who did no pumelling but merely set iron-clad foundations. Of course, the audience applauded wildly at the pause in the finale that serves as a portal to the brilliant wrap-up.

Next weekend, the featured composer will be Brahms.

On Friday night, Monteux will conduct the Boston Symphony in the Bach - Respighi Passacaglia; Brahms' Violin Concerto with Isaac Stern as soloist; the Brahms - Thomson Chorale Preludes; and Richard Strauss' "Don Juan."

Fine Response By Musicians To Tanglewood Directors

The Boston Symphony Orchestra rose en masse to greet Dr. Munch at the first concert using its full complement in the music shed at Tanglewood in the Berkshires.

The third series of the Berkshire Festival featured the composer Tschaikowsky on each of its programs.

Friday evening a stunning performance of Berlioz' "Corsair" Overture opened the concert; this was perfection in all musical facets, each musician obviously unaffected by the weather's oppressiveness.

A new work of Bohislav Martinu entitled "The Parables" followed, highly inventive and evocative in its contained tonal range. The first two movements entitled "Parable of a Garden" are taken from a posthumous work of Saint-Euxepery "Citadelle"; the plasticity of the sculpture is smoothly drawn and the growth and abundance of the garden apparent. The third "Parable of a Labyrinth" from "Voyage de Thesee" was fascinating to follow through its maze of moods.

With the "Pathetique of Tschaikowsky interpreted by Dr. Munch with an expressive clarity that transcends any overemotional display the orchestra completed a program that transported the listeners into prolonged outbursts of delight.

Saturday evening's concert opened with Weber's lively and romantic "Oberon" Overture, the horns full-throated and in excellent tone.

Lukas Foss conducted his latest work, "Symphony of Chorales" for orchestra; cleverly contrived for chorale tunes of Bach its variegated medium of transmission is so construed that only bits and patches stand forth, the whole cloth never closely woven, the strident coloring almost humorous in conception; one musician was heard to call it "spoiled Stravinsky." Perhaps longer and more careful rehearsing would clarify the piece, even the conductor seemed to overburden himself with countless dynamic changes and at times seemed at metric variance with the music.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor, with its vividly contrasting movements, its expansive moods found Mr. Monteux, with his carefully frugal indications again the composer's apostle, the orchestra quick to interpret his simple yet forceful desires. The lengthy finale caught the audience applauding before the final outburst, but with the actual climax the appreciation was thunderous and prolonged, for both orchestra and Mr. Monteux.

Next weekend's concert will feature Brahms, with a memoriam concert on Saturday including a work by Ernest Block, the recently deceased composer and conductor.

First Three Concerts At Tanglewood Shed Draw Big Audiences

The first weekend of shed concerts at Tanglewood attracted total audiences of 27,363 for the three programs.

Attendance figures, aided by considerably better weather, so far are ahead of last year's at the Berkshire Music Festival.

Charles Munch conducted Tschaikowsky's Violin Concerto with Isaac Stern as soloist Saturday night. Other works included Lukas Foss' Symphony of Chorales, for Orchestra," directed by the composer, and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

Last night veteran conductor Pierre Monteux mounted the podium for the first time this year to conduct Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Golden Cock," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Dindy's "Symphony for Orchestra and Piano on a French Mountain Song" and Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5.

Ballet Rambert Makes Debut In Berkshires

By JOHN F. KYES

LEE — The Ballet Rambert, making its American debut at Jacob's Pillow, scored strongly with the complete two-act classic ballet, "Giselle," and entertained with a modern story-piece, "Laiderette." Madame Marie Rambert has brought from London 18 vibrant young dancers and six other personable girls from the Metropolitan Opera Ballet School.

"Giselle" Effective

Beryl Goldwyn danced the title role in "Giselle" with fine projection of moods, ranging from spirited elan to utmost tenderness. Christopher Lyall and Kenneth Bannerman took the part of her handsome, deceitful royal lover in various performances, contributing technique of the highest order. Norman Morrice was effective as the rouugh gamekeeper.

Lucette Aldous and June Sandbrook, dancing alternate performances with John O'Brien as young peasants, were clever but their tasks seemed overextended for merely supporting roles.

The graveyard scene in Act II was impressive, with Gillian Martlew as Queen of the Wilis making the most of a rather cold assignment. Her 12 lovely whiteclad sprites were headed by June Sandbrook and Thelma Litster.

This work revealed the high training of Rambert ensembles, their fine precision never losing grace or becoming mechanical.

Especially moving was the dancing of Miss Beryl in Act II, and also in the well-handled and realistic "mad scene" of Act I.

Pianists David Ellenberg and Jess Meeker played the music of Adolphe Adam.

"Laiderette" Charming

"Laiderette," a modern one-acter choreographed by Kenneth McMillan to the music of Frank Martin, has the charm and mystery associated with a masked ball. The setting is lovely, the story is piquant. The dancing, except for some clever bits by Lucette Aldous, tends to be incidental.

Miss Aldous is the elfin figure (masked for the party and left on the threshold by her poor parents) who has a few moments of love from the admirable host (John Chesworth) before her mask is removed to reveal hideousness. Among the interesting ensembles are those in which Miss Aldouus and Chesworth are opposed by six rather knowing and sleek guests.

The final revelation is less horrendous, because the entire ballet is filled with masks and Pierrots, and the makeup of the heroine appears like one more bit of make-believe.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS TCHAIKOVSKY

LENOX — The Berkshire Festival swung into the first of four weekends with the full Boston Symphony Orchestra drawing audiences considerably larger than in 1958. The three-concert total 27,363, was close to that of 1957.

Emphasis on the music of Tchaikovsky was secured by including his Fifth and Sixth Symphonies and Violin Concerto. Modern music by Martinu and Foss provided startling contrasts. Pierre Monteux took over the baton on Sunday for a program rich with the colorings of Rimsky-Korsakov, Debussy and d'Indy.

Saturday evening, with Isaac Stern as soloist and Charles Munch and Lukas Foss as conductors, the orchestra layed for 10,000 persons.

New Canopy Used

The new acoustical canopy had a highly satisfactory tryout this weekend with the 100-piece orchestra. Sounds are projected sensitively, sweetly and in excellent balance.

Stern does not use a large tone in the demanding Tchaikovsky concerto but it has elegant poise and refinement. As interpreted by Munch and Stern, this concerto ranges from warm melodies to intricacies which become highly ornamental but never chattery.

The audience was hypnotized by the work of the violinist, and literally thousands remained in their places until the soloist and conductor had been recalled half a dozen times.

This Saturday concert expressed three widely variant conceptions of music. In the Weber "Oberon" Overture, Munch beguiled from his virtuoso orchestra fresh and beautiful shadings of a work long since shopworn at less skilled hands.

Lukas Foss, who conducted his own Symphony of Chorales, is a youthful and dynamic figure, a man greatly prized at Tanglewood for richly diversified talents. Two weeks ago, I heard him play the piano with small orchestra in the most dainty and persuasive of Bach's music. Saturday, he urged the big orchestra through pages which thundered and whispered, with stupendous combinations of rhythm and tonal color.

Chorales Buried

The four German chorales which he used as springboards were deeply buried at most times but in the last movement considerable portions of "Now Thank We All Our God" emerged.

The opening Toccata was amazing, and portions of the last movement returned to its spirit. The sustained craftsmanship and rigorous demands of the "Andante sostenuto" led to a witty and light Intermezzo in the third movement, proving that Foss can be intensely melodic at times.

Like many modern symphonies, this work is too continuous in its demands upon the hearer, and therefore in a sense too long, though much more absorbing than many of its modern companions.

The Tanglewood concerts next weekend will feature the music of Brahams.

CANOPY PASSES TEST:

Artistry at Peak At Tanglewood

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

There was an air of suppressed excitement permeating the 6,000-seat Shed at Tanglewood Friday night for the opening of the series of four weekend major concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (100 men and three women) under the direction of Charles Munch. Even the tuning up "A" sounded by Ralph Gomberg, first oboist, only served to accentuate the tension.

Would, or would not the new stage canopy, the gift of Mrs. Edna Betts Talbot, of Boston, measure up to the specifications as laid out by the architect, Eero Saarinem and the acoustical firm of Bolt, Beranek and Newman? With the first crashing chords of Hector Berlioz's overture, "Le Corsaire," all anxieties were dispersed. Here is high fidelity and stereophonic sound at its zenith. Here is the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its highest peak of artistry. There were no sad rights for the passing of the original acoustical shell, one which had served faithfully for 25 years.

NEW SONORITIES

The rich, colorful harmonies of the contemporary composer, Martinue's vignettes, "The Parables" took on new kaleidoscopic color under the fan-like, geometrically - constructed ceiling. But the real test was the familiar Sixth, or "Pathetique" symphony by Tchaikowsky. We have always maintained that had Mr. Tchaikowsky reversed the order of the third and fourth movements, allowing for the minor digressions, the title of the score might have read: "Joyeux." This radical idea of the writer was concurred in when the huge audience burst into spontaneous applause following the exciting third movement, a circumstance which, undoubtedly, disturbed the equanimity of the Proper Bostonians in the box section.

The feature of the Saturday night concert, also conducted by Dr. Munch, was the Tchaikowsky violin concerto, impeccably played by Isaac Stern, a mature artist who had one of his first professional engagements as guest artist with the Albany Civic Music Association at the beginning of his remarkable career. With Mr. Stern, technic is subservient to warmth and emotional self-expression. Even his indisputable lush violin tone was greatly enhanced by the blending qualities of the new projection.

Lukas Foss, a product of the Berkshire School of Music, during the reign of Mr. Koussevitzky, and an earlier piano soloist with the Albany Symphony Orchestra, conducted his own "Symphony for Chorales," based on four of Bach's beautiful melodies. He received a veritable ovation following the interesting work.

Sunday afternoon's concert was directed by Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the orchestra, who, also was the recipient of tremendous applause, during and after the concert. He offered works by Rimsky - Korsakov, Debussy and d'Indy. The latter's "Symphony on a French Mountain Song" featured a charming mademoiselle, Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, in the incidental piano solo. Tchaikowsky's brilliant "Symphony No. 5" brought the Series A concerts to a triumphant ending.

Wind-Driven Rain Pelts City, Floods Drains, Fells Trees

A violent late-afternoon thunderstorm rocked central Berkshire yesterday, dumping a half-inch of rain and causing minor damage throughout the area.

Pittsfield seemed to get the brunt of the storm in Berkshire County. Only light rain was reported in Southern Berkshire. In Lenox, the storm thoughtfully held off until the conclusion of the afternoon Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Tanglewood.

One local fatality was partially attributed to the storm. George A. Perrault, 76, of 81 Stoddard Ave., died from injuries sustained in a head-on collision at Elm and Kenwood Streets during the height of the wind and rain.

The same storm pattern played havoc with electrical and phone service, and started at least four known fires in the Springfield and northern Connecticut area. No utilities disruption was reported in the Pittsfield area.

House Hit

Hardest hit in Pittsfield was the home of Mr. and Mrs. Albert C. Litano and Mr. and Mrs. Louis C. Litano, 23-25 Lincoln St., where a large tree limb fell on their roof, collapsing a chimney and damaging the roof. The wind also felled a maple on Warwick Street.

Firemen were called to the struck home at 5:30 p.m. to investigate the possibility of fallen electrical wires. No lines were down. The Litano cellar, however, was reportedly under water.

Flooding also occurred in other low areas where catch basins were unable to cope with debris and gravel pushed on by the sudden torrent, the city Public Works Department said.

The rainfall occurred between 4:30 and 8 p.m., with heaviest amounts coming between 5 and 6, octing Airport Meteorologist Loring W. Blanchard reported.

Temperature Drops

The airport temperature plummeted 10 degrees in two hours as the storm reached its peak. The high mercury mark for the day was 86 at 3 p.m. A top reading of 83 was recorded Saturday.

Perspiring Pittsfield residents may be glad to know their weekend discomfort was justified — humidity was "extremely high both days," Mr. Blanchard said. A 100-per-cent humidity reading was recorded Saturday and again this morning, due to fogg and low clouds, he said.

Approximately 9,200 at Pontoosuc and 8,000 at Onota Lakes had their bathing activities cut short by the storm. Earlier, the Eagles band gave a concert at Pontoosuc.

Despite the latest rainfall, the July total still is .34 deficient. The year's moisture total lags a full six inches under the mid-July normal of 23.82 inches, Mr. Blanchard added.

Mr. Blanchard, who is filling in for vacationing weatherman Georg J. Bulgarelli, said record book show a monsoon like 8.34 inche fell here in July, 1945. On th other hand, only 2.03 inches wa chalked up in July, 1948.

High and low temperature e tremes for this month are 92 a 41, both in 1954.

Continued shower activity a somewhat cooler temperatures a in the offing today and tomorro Mr. Blanchard said.

Concert Altered At Music Shed To Honor Bloch

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced a change in the orchestra's program for the Berkshire Festival concert at 8:30 p.m. Saturday in the Music Shed.

He will conduct Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo," Hebrew Rhapsody for Cello and Orchestra in memory of the composer who died July 15. The soloist will be the orchestra's first cellist, Samuel Mayes.

The complete Saturday evening program will be as follows: Piston's Symphony No. 3, Bloch's "Schelomo," Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major.

The music of Ernest Bloch was first heard at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when the composer conducted his "Three Jewish Poems" March 23 and 24, 1917.

Munch conducted the first American performance of Bloch's Concerto Grosso No. 2 on Oct. 9, 1953. The Concerto Grosso won the New York Music Critics Award in 1953 for the best work in the orchestral category. Dr. Munch also presented the first performance of Bloch's Concerto for Violin in Paris in 1938. The soloist was Joseph Szigeti.

VARIETY OF MUSIC AT TANGLEWOOD

'Symphony of Chorales' by Foss Heard—Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto Played

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG
Special to The New York Times.

LENOX, Mass., July 19—Tchaikovsky was the central figure, but a variety of music nevertheless was heard on the two concerts ending the current week-end of the Berkshire Festival.

There even was a variety of conductors, what with Charles Munch conducting the Boston Symphony through most of Saturday evening's concert, with Lukas Foss relieving Mr. Munch in the Foss "Symphony of Chorales," and with Pierre Monteux conducting all of this afternoon's concert.

The week-end audience totaled 27,363. This includes the attendance at the Saturday morning rehearsal.

Saturday evening's audience listened with some perplexity and a good deal of respect to Mr. Foss' work. It is his second symphony and was finished last year. Full of energetic sound effects — more than enough to keep the entire battery busy—and rising to moments of real violence, the symphony is based on Bach chorales, though it is a good guess to say that most of those chorale themes were well hidden to the majority of the audience.

Music Full of Ideas

Th music is full of ideas and contains a good deal of vitality, even though by no stretch of the imagination could the work be called a mature effort. Mr. Foss does not have the virtue of economy, and he does not know when to stop. Thus he overworks his ideas.

It also seemed to this listener that the third movement, which uses an out-of-place salon melody, is a complete miscalculation. In view of the Gothic effect that Mr. Foss had previously created, and continued into the fourth movement, his insistence, in this third movement, on showing that he was capable of writing a pretty tune did not belong to the scheme of this particular work.

Mr. Foss conducted brilliantly and the Tanglewood audience had something to chew on. They also had Weber's "Oberon" Overture and the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto, with Isaac Stern as soloist. Mr. Stern played with his accustomed suavity—his entrance was quite the most beautiful this listener has ever heard — and with a kind of virtuosity that took into account the musical as well as technical elements of the score.

Stressed Accompaniment

The soloist this afternoon was Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, in D'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Air." This work is a symphony for piano and orchestra, but in the opening pages the pianist seemed determined to make a concerto out of it. She stressed accompaniment figures to a point where they obscured important solo themes in the orchestra. Later she settled down to better ensemble work and played with steady rhythm. It was competent but scarcely exciting piano playing.

Mr. Monteux also conducted the introduction and wedding march from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Coq d'Or," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. He made his entrance dressed entirely in white, a huge smile on his face, and was received with an ovation. How the Tanglewood audiences idolize the veteran conductor.

He was in grand form, but when is he not? He gave Mme. Henriot-Schweitzer a superb accompaniment, and his Tchaikovsky was supple, beautifully planned and perpetually lyric. It was the performance of an ardent young man who happens to have the experience of an octogenarian. Such a combination occurs once or twice in a lifetime.

Second Thoughts On Music

Appearance of Monteux Draws Tremendous Hand

Berkshire Festival Features Works by Tchaikovsky, Martinu, Weber; Munch, Stern Brilliant In Violin Concerto

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX — The past week end brought a wealth of music by Tchaikovsky to those attending the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. Fortunate weather drew approximately 27,000 persons to the three concerts. Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux divided conducting honors, the venerable French conductor taking over the Sunday concert. His appearance was the signal for a large ovation for he is held in affectionate regard by members of the orchestra and audience.

Melodic Patterns

Mr. Munch offered Bohuslav Martinu's "The Parables" on the Friday night program. It was commissioned by the orchestra for its anniversary last year and is dedicated to Mr. Munch. Like much of Martinu's compositions it is well crafted and contains interesting melodic patterns. The three Parables concern one's feeling after seeing a certain sculpture; one's reactions while sitting in a garden, and a conversation between Man and Theseus and a young girl. Regardless of what the music was about, it was pleasant to hear and well played by an orchestra which is at its best this season.

Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 6 in B minor" (the Pathetique) received a straight-forward reading which served the music well. It can be read too sweetly, with too much "smaltz." Mr. Munch labored mightily during the performance and achieved some fine results.

Conducting the Saturday night concert, Mr. Munch offered the overture to Weber's "Oberona" and then turned the baton over to Lukas Foss so that he might conduct his own "Symphony of Chorales for Orchestra," a work composed in honor of Albert Schweitzer and commisioned by the Kousevitzky Music Foundation.

The work is based on four Bach chorales which the composer has extended and sought musically to represent the feeling of the texts. Only in the relatively mild Intermezzo, a breathing place, did we find the chorale melody and were able to follow it. The other movements were so involved, so unpleasant to the ear that it was difficult to believe they came from the pen of Lukas Foss. However, this is the work of a fine and sensitive musician and must not be crossed off after a single hearing. Foss may be going through a phase—let us hope it will pass without leaving any personal scar.

Show-Stopper

Mr. Munch and Isaac Stern joined in a stunning performance of the Tchaikovsky violin concerto. The whole effect was brilliant with emphasis on pyrotechnics. Mr. Stern tossed off everything in his own suave style and was in complete rapport with Mr. Munch and the orchestra. It was a show-stopping performance.

Sunday afternoon Pierre Monteux took over and, for a brief time, the old spark of the Music Festival was rekindled. It was a royal ovation the 83-year-old conductor received from the moment he stepped on stage. One listened to performances which brought memories of a decade or more ago. The satin sheen of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Swan," the vitality of Rimsky-Korsakov's Introduction and Wedding March for "Le Coq d'Or" and the lovely line of D'Indy's "Symphony for Orchestra and Piano on a French Mountain Song." In this work the orchestra was joined for a second time by Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer, who this season is playing with an expressivity we had not perceived before. The work was played within a small frame and the spirit of the folk song was never absent. It was a beautifully integrated performance.

It was in the performance of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony that the wizardry of this conductor was fully revealed. Almost effortlessly, he summoned tremendous sonorities, evoked delicate pianissimi and provided the long line and spaciousness the music deserved. We have seen many a conductor of this work grow almost hysterical during a performance, not realizing that an orchestra can evoke just so much sound regardless of conductorial gestieulations. Monteux got everything the orchestra had to give with minimum effort. One could for once listen to the music without being disturbed by the gyrations of a conductor.

The Wednesday night chamber music concert brought us the Beaux Arts Trio of New York. The welcome guests were Menahem Pressler, pianist; Daniel Guilet, violinist, and Bernard Greenhouse, cellist. In a program in which the piano was usually predominant, Pressler again revealed his fine pianism and ensemble artistry. Mr. Guilet's violin sounded thin and not always true to pitch, but Mr. Greenhouse and his cello provided beautiful sounds. The group has been together long enough to have achieved an excellent integration and mutuality. Particularly rewarding was the performance of Mozart's "Trio in G major" K. 564 and the Beethoven "Trio in E flat, No. 2, Op. 70." The Saint-Saens' "Trio No. 1 in F major" and Copland's "Vitebek" completed the program. The Copland work sounds not more pleasant than the last time we heard it, yet Mr. Copland acknowledged about as great amount of applause as was given any number on the program.

Students Weak

The Student Orchestra is weak this year. It lacks strength in the strings from the concertmaster down. However woodwinds and brasses are very fine. Seymour Lipkin led them in Ravel's "La Valse" but it never got off the ground. There is a young conductor from Norway here who seems to have what it takes. When he is directing things go pretty well.

A Woman's New York

BY ALICE HUGHES

(July Rains Wash Out Resort Profits, But Berkshire's Tanglewood Stays Dry.)

Every night New York's Minnie Guggenheim, dea ex musica of our outdoor Stadium Concerts, and Jean Dalrymple, pert girl-producer who, this summer, has turned our Central Park skating rink into a theater-in-the-round (with the help of Ed Stone, architect) pray that there be no rain. Nonetheless, their presentations have been rained out from time to time. Likewise, many Atlantic Coasts resorts from Maine to Florida report that rainy weather has already watered down their hoped-for summer profits by 50%. The entire resort business, from July 4th to Labor Day, includes only 100 days. This July, Nature, by turning on its most turbulant taps, has practically washed out profits with the season already half over.

But inland, along the undulant Massachusetts Berkshire hills, not a single storm has cancelled out this season's summer Berkshire Festival concerts at Tanglewood. Four times a week the Boston Symphony Orchestra, baton'd by conductor Charles Munch sounds off from the Music Shed, newly equipped with an acoustical stage canopy which enhances magnificent tone, On Friday and Saturday evening, and Sunday afternoon, concerts, plus Saturday morning rehearsal performances the big band, with 105 players when in full strength, toots itself into tune before an approximately 7000 spectators. Six thousand ticket holders sit inside the Music Shed and another 1000 bring chairs or blankets for the added magic of music under the sun or stars.

The third week in July we shined up our Dauphine and in less than four hours streaked the 140 miles from New York to Lenox, Mass. There Tanglewood lies sprawled over 210 acres of stately trees, prim New England gardens and rolling lawns, against a backdrop of sparkling blue lake. The eyes and ears are ravished by this historic spot where Hawthorne wrote "The House of Seven Gables" and planned his "Tanglewood Tales" and "The Wonder Book." In such an atmosphere, when the orchestra saturates the air with Weber's Overture to "Oberon" enchantment dissolves life's slings and arrows. For finale, Isaac Stern played Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto in D Major, and we seemed to be living in a lyrical paradise.

Conductor Munch shared the baton with Lukas Foss, who conducted his own "Symphony of Chorales" on Saturday night. At the Sunday afternoon concert Munch invited Pierre Monteux to guest-conduct a richly varied program of Rimsky-Korsakov, Debussy and Tchaikovsky, whose husband is the newphew of Dr. Schweitzer, the African missionary doctor. She is reputed to be one of the two best Mozart pianists, the other being Clara Haskell. I can think of no more delightful place to absorb music than at Tanglewood. It combines a blissful blend of musical dedication and casual ease. A few summers ago women and girls who came to the concerts wearing shorts or slacks, were given skirts to wear. Now the ban on pants and shorts has been lifted.

The Berkshire Music Center attracts several hundred young students in all fields of music. Teaching is by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and additional talent is signed for these summer music courses. To find oneself on Tanglewood's green pasture is a tuneful treat.

MUSIC

TANGLEWOOD

Berkshire Festival

By ELINOR HUGHES

The third week-end of the 22nd season of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood proved to be an eventful one, filled with surprises, which were interesting or pleasant or both, and with weather which, beginning with the humidity of Friday, wound up with two of the most glorious days imaginable, such as you find only in the Berkshires.

For those who have not been to Tanglewood this summer, but who may go this week or next season, something new and very interesting has been added: the new stage canopy in the Shed, a memorial to Edward Hawes Talbot given by his wife and designed by Eero Saarinen & Associates of Detroit. Built of waterproof plywood and colored a dark gray it lines the stage and suspends its airy triangles—which give the illusion of being about to take flight—over the first rows of seats.

Improved Quality

From the center of the Shed, a little more than half way back, the acousties were beautifully balanced, and I am told that there is a great improvement in the quality of the sound heard by listeners sitting on the lawn outside. On Friday night, in the still, hot air, bemused insects danced in the light, weaving their way in and out of the triangles.

The discomfort of the night for the musicians can only be guessed at, but the evening was one of unadulterated musical delight. With Pierre Monteux as guest conductor and Isaac Stern as soloist in the Brahms Violin Concerto in D major, and other works including the Bach Pasacaglia and Fugue in C minor, orchestrated by Respighi, Strauss' "Don Juan" and Virgil Thomson's Orchestrations of Brahms' Eleven Chorale Preludes, Op. 22, it was an evening of familiar pleasures and rare experience.

Mr. Stern received an ovation after the first movement of the concerto and an even greater one at the close of the work, and such feeling, sensitive and beautiful musicianship deserved it. The Thomson orchestrations of the Chorale Preludes, which have not been heard before at these concerts nor, I believe, in Boston, were a series of short, intensely felt and intimate exercises in counterpoint, all devotional in mood and very moving.

Saturday night's program which, like Sunday afternoon's, was conducted by Mr. Munch, was changed to permit the including of Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo," as a memorial to the gifted composer from Geneva who made his home here for so many years and died 12 days ago on the eve of his 79th birthday. It replaced the previously announced Academic Festival Overture by Brahms.

The second change was a substitution of Brahms' Symphony No. 2 for the previously announced Symphony No. 1, the only work remaining of the original program being Walter Piston's Symphony No. 3. This composition receiving a lively, lucid and sympathetic performance by the orchestra, and was greeted with the utmost cordiality by the audience, which was not just being polite, any more than I am when I say that this symphony, a Pulitzer Prize winner, becomes more enjoyable with each hearing. Mr. Piston was brought out repeatedly by Mr. Munch following the performance.

The Brahms No. 2 received an eloquent, affectionate and rather leisurely traversal, and "Schelomo" was played, or so it seemed, with affection and regret for a composer whose rich and colorful compositions have contributed so much to the pleasure of Boston Symphony hearers over the years.

Fine Attendance

Yesterday afternoon, a gloriously beautiful day which inspired very fine attendance, Mr. Munch substituted the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1 for the scheduled Brahms Concerto No. 2, but otherwise adhered to the program previously planned. The Variations on a Theme by Haydn led off in fine style, and this was followed by Aaron Copland's spirited conducting of a suite of his opera, "The Tender Land."

Mr. Copland is wonderfully happy with Americana, and the three-part suite was warm, melodiuos and filled with a spirit of sturdy optimism and a love for the land. Suggestions of a square dance bring back memories of "Rodeo," but I didn't feel that the composer is repeating himself: he just likes American folk dance rhythms.

Rudolf Serkin was soloist in the Brahms Concerto, and his interpretation of this magnificent work suffers no loss in repetition but is rather enriched each time he plays it. The orchestra supplemented him superbly, and the audience responded with rapt devotion and great enthusiasm at the close.

Attendance for the week end came to 27,500, with the great number of persons present yesterday afternoon.

Stern Soloist As Thousands Enjoy Third Berkshire Concert Weekend

A five minute standing ovation brought violin soloist Isaac Stern back onto the Tanglewood stage six times last Saturday night, July 18, as the music loving thousands expressed overwhelming appreciation for the musician's masterly performance of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto in D major. Making his first appearance this summer at the Berkshire Music Festival, Mr. Stern's rendition of the very difficult solo earned the generous plaudits bestowed upon him. His playing demonstrated extreme sensitivity and feeling for the intensely romantic violin piece. His overall interpretation was one of string-magic.

On the same program Saturday night, Lucas Foss Conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of his own composition, the highly iconoclastic "Symphony of Chorales," written only last year. In the first movement, the Toccata, the audience was immediately impressed by the imaginative and unconventional use of instruments to produce a radically dynamic effect. The concert shed fairly trembled to the frenetic and pulsing sounds. A spirit of erupting terror seemed to underly the entire first movement. Bells crashed and clashed and the drums boomed thunder. The very discernible excited buzz which spread throughout the audience at the completion of the Toccata indicated that those in attendance were noticeably struck by this highly forceful and original beginning.

The second movement, the Andanta sostenuto, picked up the theme again, this time adding sensation of ominous musical incantation to some impelling doom conveying with it a frantic and eerie forboding of cosmological havoc. A quiet and soothing calm followed this violent cataclysm. Appropriately enough, Allegretto tranquillo is the name given to this third movement which was indeed tranquil. The fourth movement marked a regenerative and reformative return to some earlier themes accompanied this time by lighter tones and a less phantasmic spirit. There was also in this final movement a quality of contest between the dark, awesome forces heard earlier and the newer and lighter feelings freshly introduced. The audience was warm in reception to Mr. Foss' singularly individualistic work.

Rounding out the Saturday night program was Weber's "Overture to Oberon," played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with all the delicate softness the selection deserves.

Sunday afternoon's performance at 2:30 p.m. in the Music Shed saw Pierre Monteux as guest conductor for the rendition of four Russian and French selections which featured Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor. The program commenced with the vibrant and colorful "Introduction and Wedding March from Le Coq d'Or" by Rimsky-Korsakov. This was followed by the popular Debussy work, "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune" (Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun). The Boston Symphony rendered this ethereal work with a light and gossamer quality which sang of spirits and nymphs and rushing streams in an enchanted forest. Nicole Henriot-Schwietzer was pianoforte soloist for the d'Indy composition, "Symphony for Orchestra and Pianoforte on a French Mountain Song." The familiar and warm thematic third movement was adroitly and expressively played by the Boston Symphony.

Following the intermission, the concert resumed with the majestic 5th Symphony of Tchaikovsky. A Berkshire breeze began to stir the trees on the huge lawn in pastoral accompaniment as the sonorous and dramatic symphony commenced. The deep emotion and rich intensity of the splendid 5th Symphony themes provided the Boston Symphony with the opportunity of displaying their polish and renowned grace. The playing was brilliant and the mood magnificent as the winds rippled the great trees during the moving and ecclestiacal Andante cantabile.

In all, an estimated 20,000 music lovers gathered at Tanglewood for a weekend of the classical and solemn, the lyrical and romantic, the progressive and inspired. The 200 acres of green, velvety hills and giant trees provided a lush and bucolic setting in which to enjoy the offerings of the Boston Symphony.

Visitors to Tanglewood who walk the sprawling grounds before a concert are constantly impressed by the poetic splendor in which students gather from all over the world for a summer of study with the greats, in contemporary music. Besides visiting the several music barns where a choir rehearsal or instrument practice is always in the offering, a Tanglewood guest can see the red house overlooking the swelling mountains where Nathanial Hawthorne found inspiration and wrote "Tanglewood Tales" and "The House of Seven Gables." There are also the hemlock gardens to stroll through, the music library and collection to browse, and a picnic area.

Certainly the outdoor summer concert, and especially Tanglewood, has become an American institution in recent years. The quality of the fine music, the lush Berkshire setting, the balmy breezes which accompany a plaintive Tchaikovsky work, all are insurance factors indicating that the commendable taste expressed by music lovers has found a permanent place in the nation's culture.

'Festival Of Two Worlds' Featured On TV Tonight

By GORDON E. ARMSTRONG

The Ed Sullivan Show on the CBS Television Network this evening (8-9) promises to be a real "toast" to music lovers on the part of the popular columnist-showman. The entire program will be devoted to highlights of Gian Carlo Menotti's current "Festival of Two Worlds" in the Umbrian hill town of Spoleto, Italy. More accurately, the telecast will not be an all-musical one since drama and ballet are also important phases of this annual festival.

Sullivan and his director, Robert Precht, headed the crew of technicians which recently flew to Italy to make a video tape of the festival's highlights. The programs were filmed against authentic backgrounds of the 2,000 year old town of Spoleto where Menotti founded this colorful festival last year.

For instance, the accomplished American soprano, Eileen Farrell, will be shown in three colorful and historic locales. The singer, who incidentally made her European debut at this summer's festival, will be heard first with Louis Armstrong's band as they performed in the town's market place. Later in the program she sings a portion of Verdi's "Requiem" in front of the ancient Duomo Cathedral. In her third appearance, Miss Farrell presents "Pace, Pace, Mio Dio", a performance which was taped in a pre-Roman amphitheater.

Director Precht took his technical crew inside the town's opera house to record portions of a performance of a rarely heard Donizetti opera, "Duke of Alba." These operatic excerpts add to the video tap's musical attractions. Another is to be the television debut of a new Italian singer, Ornelle Vavone, who will be heard in an offering with an orchestral accompaniment under the direction of the American conductor, Thomas Schippers. The conductor will also be seen as Miss Farrell's piano accompanist as she sings in the amphitheater.

The show's dramatic presentations are to include excerpts from two plays—"Night of the Iguana," by Tennessee Williams and Menotti's "A Hand of Bridge." Also, Sir John Gielgud, one of the world's most distinguished and honored actors, is to present selections from his widely acclaimed one-man show, Shakespeare's "Ages of Man."

More of Spoleto's old-world atmosphere is captured in backgrounds for the ballet portions of tonight's show. A specially choreographed ballet by Herb Ross, "Romeo and Juliet," was performed by the American ballerina Nora Kaye, supported by Scott Douglas, on a three-block long flight of stone steps leading to the square in front of the Duomo Cathedral. "Ballet U.S.A.", by Jerome Robbins, and "Five Senses", by John Butler are to complete the dance portion of the program.

Since jazz, opera, drama, and ballet are included in this Sullivan "extravaganza", tonight's telecast is surely one of unusual interest to young and old. No, Ed hasn't forgotten the youngsters—Italy's famous Walton's Puppets are also on tap or if you will, on tape!

FIFTH CONCERT AT NORFOLK

Students in the Norfolk Music School will give the fifth concert in this series at the Music Shed in Norfolk on Wednesday afternoon at 3:30. Works for various instrumental combinations will lend unusual variety and interest to the program which is to feature the school's orchestra, directed by Robert Brink, in a performance of the Symphony in E flat by Anton Filtz.

Excerpts from the following works are to be heard: Beethoven's Serenade in D major, Op. 25 (flute, violin, viola); Mozart's Trio in E flat (clarinet, viola, piano); Beethoven's Sonata in F major, Op. 24 (violin and piano); Vivaldi's Concerto in G minor for two cellos; Ravel's String Quartet in F major; Piano Quartet in G minor, by Brahms.

FINALISTS COMPETE FOR AWARD

For the first time in the history of the Connecticut Valley Music Festival, an audience will hear the finalists compete for the festival's annual Murat Award. This competition will take place during the violin recital by the young American violinist, David Davis, to be given as the second program of the current festival's series at the Valley Regional Auditorium in Deep River on Thursday evening.

The Murat Award is presented to the winner of the annual competition for young Connecticut musicians, held under the auspices of the festival in memory of its founder, Ronald Murat. Geraldine Smith, chairman of the contest, has announced the finalists to be heard on Thursday. They are: pianist Walter Brennan, of Woodbury; contralto Louise Anna Pawlow, of Newington; and pianist Barbara Hudobenko, of Naugatuck.

Thursday's panel of judges includes the following prominent musical figures; Arnold Franchetti, composer and member of the Hartt School of Music faculty; Maria Kurenko, concert soprano of Lyme and New York City; Herbert Stessin, young pianist heard in the festival's opening program; Marguerite Valentine, piano pedagogue of New York City.

FESTIVAL AT HALF-WAY MARK

The fourth weekend of concerts by the Boston Symphony will bring the main series at the Berkshire Music Festival to the halfway mark with next Sunday afternoon's program. Charles Munch will conduct that program as well as the one the previous evening. Next Friday evening's concert will have guest conductor Pierre Monteux on the podium.

Isaac Stern is to be the soloist in Brahms' Violin Concerto, the highlight of Friday's program. The other works listed are as follows: Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor, orchestrated by Respighi; Eleven Chorale Preludes of Brahms (Op. 122), orchestrated by Virgil Thomson; and the Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan."

For Saturday evening's program, Dr. Munch has chosen two more works by Brahms—the Academic Festival Overture and the Symphony No. 1. The Symphony No. 3 by Harvard's Walter Piston will round out this program.

The greater part of Sunday's concert will also be given over to two favorite Brahms' works—his Variations on a Theme by Haydn and the Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat major. Rudolph Serkin is to be the soloist in the latter performance. Aaron Copland's orchestral suite from his opera "The Tender Land" is the program's other offering. Others travel and in our mail this week was a card from the Grand Canyon.

We were not far from it in the Yellowstone. Another card bore the invitation postmark of Calgary, Alberta. It's the time of the annual stampede when all Calgary takes time off for the big rodeo. There will be Indians (real ones), cowboys and horses and much excitement and fun. Years ago we spent a week there and they drove us a short distance from the city, where they have huge dinosaurs roaming the plain. They are very lifelike.

Another memory of the city is funnier. From the home of our hostess we watched the sunset for a long time and finally remarked on the fact. He laughed and said, "the sunset is not in that direction, those are our oilfields burning out on the prarie". At that time the Prince of Wales owned a lot of oil near Calgary. Must get out "Mrs. Mike" again and read again of the city's early days.

Almost time for rehearsals Saturday morning at Tanglewood only a dollar, the time 10:00 and you can get a lunch there or take it.

The Bel Arte Trio

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE FOURTH chamber music concert of the regular Wednesday evening series was played in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood last night by the Bel Arte Trio, Ruth Posselt, violin, Joseph de Pasquale, viola, and Samuel Mayes, cello. They played the Beethoven Trio, Op. 3, No. 3, in C minor and the Dohnanyi Serenade, Op. 10. After intermission they were joined by Ralph Berkowitz, pianist, for the Brahms quartet, Op. 25, G minor.

By a remarkable coincidence all the pieces in the program were produced when each of the three composers was in his 28th year: Beethoven in 1798, Brahms in 1861 and Dohnanyi in 1904. The literature for string trio is decidedly small, and few have been attracted to write for this special combination. Dohnanyi attempted it but this single time; Beethoven had written three previously to the one played last night.

LACKING the second violin of a string quartet, the artists are exposed quite beyond the comparative protective security of four instruments. But it would be difficult to find three individuals who possess a more beautiful tone and complete technical mastery than the Bel Arte members.

The Beethoven, early as it is among his chamber music, is already the music of a man with the weight of the world on his shoulders. Dohnanyi at this point is without a care, flippant, even debonair and witty, but with an exceptional sense of the capabilities of strings. His scherzo is a bit of fireworks that would not come off at all in hands less skilled than those of the virtuosi who played it last night and made it a later-day "Midsummer Night's Dream."

THIS WAS ensemble playing of the first water, but the best ensemble thinking of the evening occurred in the piano quartet where there was actually more meaty substance to masticate. The initial piano statement was comforting for although Brahms asked for it allegro, it immediately subsides into a dolce mood not to be disturbed till the strings take over the original piano theme. This sense of appropriateness pervaded the whole performance and gave it authenticity, although they must have had access to traditions beyond our ken for the privilege of taking a breath in the exciting, final, boisterous Hungarian dance before repeating the theme in the suddenly more quiet, mysterious spirit that Beethoven wrote.

EACH of the young composers gave evidence of being interested in extending the expressive range of the instruments for which he wrote. There is always much discussion concerning the playing standards in Beethoven's time, and one wonders if there were any performers in his day, even though he obviously wrote for them, who could play with such articulation the swirls and flourishes his trio contains and which the three artists threw off with such audacious brush strokes. And Dohnanyi can not have heard his scherzo played with more sparkle and clarity than the largest audience of the chamber music season heard and applauded last night.

Brahms wanted a certain tone effect in his intermezzo and indicates that the violin alone, of the strings, should use a mute, thus placing that instrument, so to speak, off stage in the wings. He used this device at other times, too, but never more tellingly. Needless to say, the audience, so many of whom were familiar with the program, showed their enthusiasm for its superb rendition.

Brahm's weekend set for tanglewood series

PIERRE MONTEUX

The fourth weekend of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. will get underway tomorrow evening, (Friday) at 8:30 p. m. and continue on Saturday at 8:30 p. m. and Sunday at 2:30 p. m. Featured will be the music of Johannes Brahms.

Pierre Monteux will be guest conductor of tomorrow evening's concert. His program will include Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C. Minor, orchestrated by Ottorino Respighi, Brahm's Violin Concerto in D Major, Op. 77 with Isaac Stern as soloist; Eleven Chorale Preludes, Op. 122 by Brahms, orchestrated by Virgil Thompson and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan,' Op. 20.

CHARLES MUNCH

Saturday's program has been changed from the one originally scheduled. The best information on hand at press time indicates that the Boston Symphony's permanent conductor, Charles Munch, wished to pay tribute to the composer Bloch, who died recently and has scheduled some music by the late composer for the first half of the concert. In addition the orchestra will perform Piston's Symphony No. 3. The second half of the concert will hear the performance of one of Brahm's symphony, his second, instead of the first as had been originally scheduled. Brahm's Academic Festival Overture, originally scheduled, will not be played.

Rudolph Serkin will be the piano soloist in the third concert of the weekend on Sunday afternoon with Dr. Munch again conducting. The program will open with Brahm's Variations On a Theme by Haydn. Then Aaron Copland, noted merican composer and Chairman of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, will conduct his own orchestral suite from the opera "The Tender Land". Mr. Serkin will be soloist in Brahm's Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat major, Op. 83.

The feature of this past weekend's concert series was the very warm and beautifully read Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto, as performed by Isaac Stern. Lukas Foss conducted his Symphony of the Chorales which one must get used to.

For those who cannot get up to Tanglewood for as many concerts as they would wish two area FM stations are doing a fine job in bringing the Tanglewood concerts into the home: WNHC-FM broadcasts live each Saturday evening's concert from the WQXR network and WHCN, Hartford presents taped re-broadcasts of the previous week's concerts every Monday and Friday evenings at 8:30 p. m. The New Haven station is at 99.1 mc. and the very good Hartford outlet is at 106.1 mc.

Bel Arte Trio, Pianist Heard At Tanglewood

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX—The chamber music concert at Tanglewood Wednesday night was given by the Bel Arte Trio composed of Ruth Posselt, violin, Joseph De Pasquale, viola, and Samuel Mayes, cello.

Rewarding Program

When so skilled musicians get together to make music one is sure of a rewarding period of listening. The trio offered works by Beethoven and Dohnanyi, and, with pianist Ralph Berkowitz, the Brahms "Piano Quartet in G Minor," Op. 25

Beethoven handles the trio form with utmost confidence and with obvious affection. The "Trio in C Minor," Op. 9, No. 3 is a sunny work rich in imagination and interesting developments. Of the three trios for strings, this is the only one in the minor and it is perhaps the most stalwart member of the three. In spite of the minor key, which usually denotes tragedy, the work seems a happy one, often serene yet never bloodless.

In spite of some erratic intonation, the performance went well with the three artists successfully realizing the intent of the work.

Charming Work

Dohnanyi's "Serenade for String Trio" is an utterly charming work, one which the layman can enjoy a first hearing. Its five movements range through a march, romance, scherzo, variations and rondo. It is a busy work, rich in imagery and delightfully varied.

The trio brought to it a fine balance and blend of tone as well as a feeling of enjoyment in its performance. Its appeal to the audience was ambly evident. Good comedy can be instantly recognized and Dohnanyi proves himself a comedian who is also capable of serious utterance.

Brahms' "Quartet for Piano and Strings, in G minor," Op. 25, is the first of the three piano quartets. The combination had been used but seldom up to his time, but it proved congenial to the composer and he handles it with a freedom and confidence not thus far achieved by others.

Fine Pianist

Mr. Berkowitz is a fine pianist and one listened to a full bodied, sonorous performance beautifully integrated and stylistically sound. The listener will not soon forget the beauty and melodic charm of the intermezzo or the swift display of pyrotechnics in the rondo and final presto.

Next Wednesday night the chamber music concert will be given by Alexander Schneider, violin, and Leon Kirchner, piano. The program will include the Mozart sonatas for violin and piano in B flat, K. 570, and B flat, K. 454. Mr. Kirchner will play his piano sonata (1948) and join with Mr. Scheneider in his "Sonata Concertante for Piano and Violin" (1952).

Berkshires Offer Host Of Vacation Selections

Classical Music, Jazz, Theater Productions, Camping or Luxury Living All Available

Many places vie for the title "Vacationland," but none can exceed the diversity of recreation to be found in the 942 square miles of wooded beauty and cultural delights which is Berkshire County.

Variety Abounds

Bounding the Commonwealth of the west, from the rugged Vermont country in the north to the Connecticut hills in the south, "The Berkshires" come close to being all things to all people.

This will undoubtedly come as news to those who have thought of the area as a rugged, campers' country — good for fishing and hunting and roughing it in general, but probably no place for one who prefers the finer things in life.

But the finer things in life are available in great variety in the Berkshires. This week, to take a merely representative sampling, the Boston Symphony will perform Rimsky-Korsakov, Debussy and Tchaikovsky under the venerable Pierre Monteux, and Brahms and Piston under Charles Munch, in the indescribably beautiful setting at Tanglewood. There, too, will be the precise yet delicate violin mastery of Isaac Stern.

Not to dwell too long on the classical in music—still in the week will be heard the Bel Arte Trio, Madelyn Vose and William Reynolds—for perhaps too much classical would leave the lover of the modern idiom feeling discouraged, and this will not happen in the Berkshires. For those who leave pear shaped tones to the squares, there is the Dave Brubeck Quartet, Sarah Vaughn and Tom Lehrer.

30 Productions Billed

For lovers of the legitimate theater, the finest acting talent has gathered to present "Picnic," "Pal Joey," "Diary of Anne Frank," "Charlie's Aunt" and "Howie." During the summer months, something over 30 full scale productions are mounted—certainly ample fare for the most demanding theatergoer. Should your theater preference turn toward the dance, however, Jacobs Pillow offers the incomparable Ruth St. Denis, Ted Shawn, the Ballet Rambert, Ballet Espanol Ximenez Vargas, Thomas Andrews, Jean Cebron and Baskar and Company.

Between evenings of watching, there is plenty to do when you would like to participate in your own entertainment. The country is dotted with lakes just fine for swimming or boating or bringing in bass, trout or perch. The woods vary from well-blazed trails for the tenderfoot to veritable "forests primeval" where it is possible to get dangerously lost, if you don't know how to manage.

The living can be as easy or as rugged as you wish. If you are a do-it-yourself camper, you can stay in one of the many state park campsites, where tentspace costs $1 a day. Or for the ultimate in do-nothing-yourself, there is the Berkshire Inn, the Curtis Hotel and myriad others catering to luxurious living.

Museums, Too

Afternoons may always be well spent in browsing through one of the museums. No backwoods trading posts these! The Clark Art Institute in Williamstown has an extensive collection of paintings, drawings, prints and sculpture by masters of six centuries. Similarly, the Berkshire Museum in Pittsfield, has the magnificent Spalding Chinese collection.

So if you have thought of the Berkshires as a country cabin with oil lanterns, you owe it to yourself to get better acquainted with this most diversified of all vacationlands.

Eliminate The Negative

THERE IS a possibility that because of all the tumult and shouting about indecent motion pictures, objectionable books, questionable television shows and downright pornography, we may forget the many good and beautiful things available to ourselves and our children for entertainment in our leisure hours.

Here in the four counties of our Diocese of Springfield, we have many definite advantages. Every summer, for the time it takes to make a short run up the Turnpike to Lenox, we can attend the concerts at Tanglewood, concerts given by one of the best, certainly, if not the best orchestra in the world — the Boston Symphony.

The City of Springfield has one of the finest libraries in the country and the affiliation of local libraries with Springfield's and, in turn, Springfield's arrangements with the other great libraries, gives any of us access to any information we may want or need, in any conceivable field.

There are plenty of television programs that are entirely harmless and a few that can qualify as excellent, both from a moral and an esthetic viewpoint. Similarly good music is always available on FM radio bands and many local stations on regular AM broadcast bands furnish several hours a day of the best in recorded music.

As far as motion pictures are concerned, a little thought, taking the trouble to read newspaper reviews and scan the Legion of Decency ratings will give us the guidance we need toward good movie entertainment.

St. Thomas Aquinas, who has been famous for centuries for knowing what he was talking about, said that mankind cannot live without pleasure. Holy Mother Church knows this too, in fact she knew it long before St. Thomas was born. That is why she has always encouraged true art in all its forms.

In the words of a popular song of a few years (or is it decades?) ago, a song that would hardly qualify as high art, but was none-the-less good entertainment, "You Gotta Accentuate the Positive." Let's focus our minds and those of our children on the inexhaustible treasures of true art available to us — the great literature of past and present, the wonderful music that has been written and is being written, the beautiful paintings in our galleries and at our art colonies.

If we confine the many leisure hours that our American way of life has given us to all the good and beautiful things within easy reach, we won't have time to waste on the baser things that can only spoil our fun, degrade us in the eyes of our neighbors and stain our souls.

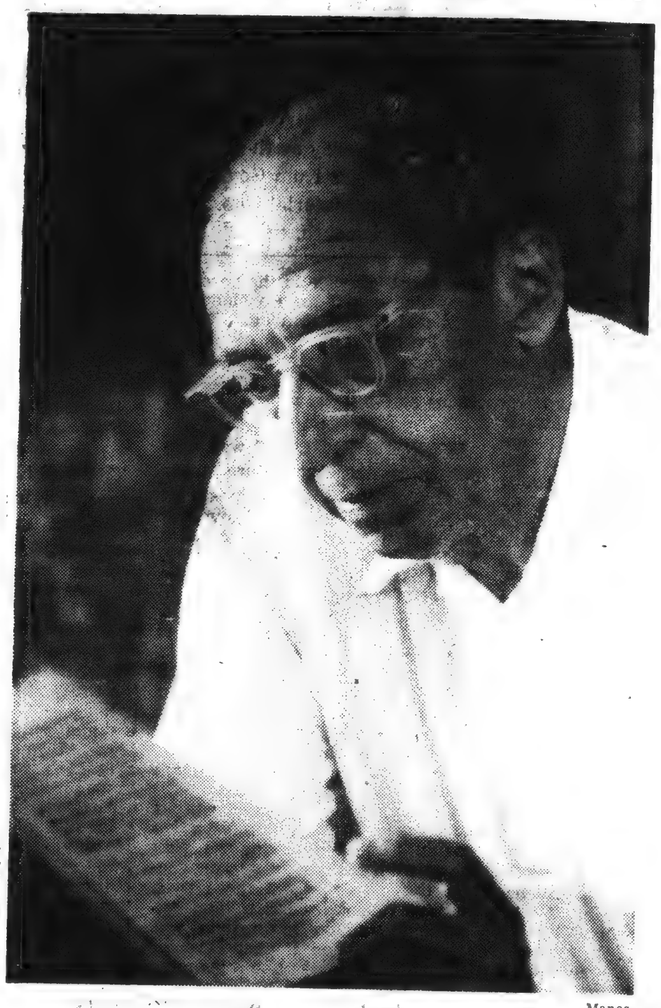
Fair Weather Is Forecast For Weekend Festival Events



Manos

Aaron Copland, the American composer and head of the department of composition at the Berkshire Music Center, looks over the score of his "Tender Land" suite which he will conduct tomorrow afternoon at the Music Shed during the first half of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program.

TANGLEWOOD—With fair weather forecast for tonight and tomorrow, another big weekend appears to be in store for the Berkshire Festival. Last night a crowd of 7,800 turned out for the second Berkshire Nights concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Shed with Pierre Monteux conducting and Isaac Stern as violin soloist.

Tonight Dr. Charles Munch, musical director of the BSO, will conduct a concert beginning at 8:30 and featuring the works of Brahms and Piston.

Tomorrow afternoon at 2:30 Dr. Munch will share the conducting honors with Aaron Copland, head of the department of composition at the Berkshire Music Center, who will conduct his "Tender Land" suite.

Serkin Soloist

Rudolf Serkin, noted pianist, will close the afternoon program when he appears with Dr. Munch and the orchestra in Brahms' Piano Concerto in D minor, No. 1.

A student chamber-music concert will be given tomorrow morning at 10 and a composers' forum is scheduled for tomorrow evening at 8:30.

The Tanglewood choir will present a program on Tuesday at 8:30 in the theater-concert hall. This concert and other student concerts during the week are open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. The regular student orchestra concert will be held Thursday evening at 8:30 in the Music Shed.

A change has been announced in the Seminar in Contemporary Music scheduled for Friday, July 31, at 3:15 in the chamber music hall. Robert Craft, who will be unable to come to Tanglewood because of a recent accident, will be replaced by Lukas Foss.

Composers of the "Romantic Period", will be featured in the following weekend programs (July 31-Aug. 1, 2).

Requiem Next Friday

Friday evening's program will be devoted in its entirety to Berlioz' Requiem, which will be presented as a memorial to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, BSO musical director for 25 years and founder of the Berkshire Music Center. The tenor soloist will be John McCollum. The Festival chorus, trained by Hugh Ross and Lorna Cooke DeVaron, will be joined by the University of Maryland Chapel Choir whose conductor is Fague Springmann.

Additional brass players will join the regular orchestra to form the four brass choirs heard at "Dies Irae," "Tuba Mirum," and "Lacrymosa" of the Requiem Mass.

Dormant Spark Rekindled As Monteux Wields Baton

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX—Pierre Monteux did it again Friday night. He kindled a spark which has lain dormant since the death of Serge Koussevitzky. Conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra he ran through a program which included the Respighi arrangement of the Bach "Passacaglia and Fugue in C Minor"; the Brahms violin concerto, with Isaac Stern as soloist; Virgil Thomson's orchestral arrangement of eleven chorale preludes for organ, by Brahms and Strauss s tone poem "Don Juan."

Tremendous Achievement

This concert was a tremendous artistic achievement. The splendid arrangement of the Passacaglia is purely orchestral and does not attempt to keep to the organ original. The powerful variations were crystal clear and the sound which came from the orchestra was superb.

It was been many, many years since I have heard so powerful a performance of the violin concerto. Issac Stern was at his best and few can equal him when he is at his best. The lengthy opening movement was magnificent in its breadth and spaciousness; its lyricism which was never restful but provided the needed contrast and the perfect understanding between conductor and soloist. At its conclusion the audience responded with an ovation only rivaled by that which was offered at the conclusion of the work. The exquisite adagio, one of the most beautiful romanzas ever penned, was played with simplicity of approach and ravishingly lovely tone. The finale with its arrogant chords and decisive rhythms was literally bathed in tonal strength and pulsating with life. This was violin playing in the grand manner with superb support from all.

During intermission we were told that Fritz Kreisler was in a hospital seriously ill. We well remember when he visited Tanglewood a couple of years ago and in spite of age and weakness went backstage to congratulate the violin soloist of the concert who was, if memory is correct, Francesscatti.

Wonderfully Clear

Virgil Thomson has orchestrated 11 chorale preludes for organ by Brahms in his usual fine style. Using primarily organ registration, he has enmeshed each prelude in a transparent web of beautiful hues. The melody is always clear and gains in beauty through the hues of the many instruments. The orchestration is within a relatively small frame so that the thought expressed by the preludes is never lost. Mr. Monteux provided a wonderfully clear and eloquent performance.

The concluding work was the Strauss tone poem "Don Juan" and who would know the temperament of the lusty, devil-may-care Don better than a Frenchman. It was a brilliant earthy conception with the orchestra playing with splendid esprit.

Program Change

Sunday afternoon's program has been changed as far as the soloist, Rudolph Serkin, is concerned. He will play the first piano concerto of Brahms rather than the scheduled second piano concerto. The program will open with Brahms' "variations on a theme by Haydn" and will also include an orchestral suite from "The Tender Land," an opera by Copland, who will conduct.

Music Review

Monteux Conducts the BSO

BY JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE FOURTH weekend at Tanglewood began with a concert in the Shed last night in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra was conducted by Pierre Monteux. The concert programs will be dominated by the music of Brahms. In the first concerto last night, the soloist was Isaac Stern.

The opening part of the program, however, was a youthful-sounding performance of Strauss' Don Juan, which would have been more suitable later in the evening. Strauss composed this work for his own orchestra, but it is also a favorite with the Boston Orchestra, and Monteux gave them the rein, and while we would not detract an iota from the ovation the wildly happy audience gave the conductor, we wish the demonstration could have been channeled more properly to the spirit of Strauss and to the orchestra, whose virtuosity was scintillating and whose tone marvellously sonorous.

THERE WAS little of daring on the program. Each half had begun with orchestration exercises by Ottorino Respighi and Virgil Thomson on original music of Bach and Brahms, respectively. Respighi's conversion of Bach's passacaglia and fugue in C minor is grateful to the ear, especially the opening statement where the organ joins the instruments in the deepest orchestral registers. Thomson elaborated "Eleven Choral Preludes" of Brahms this composer's last essays. There is scriptural solemnity to the preludes and Thomson preserves them without distortion in their new setting.

STERN was making his second appearance of the Tanglewood season and his Brahms was masterful and confident. It is as wrong to enter a concert hall with a preconceived idea of the performance of the program as it is to listen to a debate with prejudiced opinions. Recognizing this, it calls for false magnanimity to permit the soloist his personel interpretation but we protest, mildly, when he does not use his magnificent qualifications in a truer vitalization of the composer's writing. But before we are drawn into a debate on whose discernment or perception we consider more valid, it may be fairer to list those instances where the performer not only satisfied us completely, but raised us from our seats by sheer galvanic levitation and tonal majesty.

His program will include the Mozart Sonata in B flat; Brahms Sonata in A major and the Sonata in D minor by Jouzas Groudis.

Dr. Charles Munch will conduct tomorrow afternoon's concert at the Berkshire festival in Lenox. Making guest appearances for the program will be Aaron Copland, composer-conductor who will direct the Boston Symphony orchestra in his composition, "Tender Land" Suite and the eminent pianist, Rudolf Serkin, who will be heard in the D Minor Piano Concerto No. 1 by Brahms. Dr. Munch will open the program with Brahms' Haydn Variations.

Next Tuesday evening in the Festival theater at 8:30 a chamber music concert featuring Alexander Schneider, violinist and Leon Kirchner, pianist, will be presented. The program will include the sonatas of Mozart and Kirchner. The Berkshire Music Center orchestra will play Wednesday evening, and on Thursday evening, in the Shed, Dr. Munch will conduct the Koussevitsky Memorial concert. The program will be the Berlioz "Requiem" with John McCollum, tenor, and the Festival chorus.

The Organ Institute of Andover has announced the schedule for the 1959 Institute series which will be held in the Methuen Memorial Music hall. The programs, three in number, will feature the world renown organist, E. Power Biggs, who will play on Friday evening Aug. 7 and Friday evening, Aug. 21 and Arthur Howes, noted organist-conductor, and director of the Organ Institute will play on Friday evening, Aug. 14. Mr. Howes is presently in Europe where he is directing a series for both American and European instrumentalists.

"Bloomer Girl" the delightful and popular musical will headline next week's activities at the North Shore Music theater. The company featured will include stars of both the regular season and summer circuit.

Wesley Boynton and Morse Haithwaite have selected Youman's musical masterpiece, "No, No Nanette" for the coming week. Performances will open Wednesday evening and continue through Saturday. The vehicle will include a fine cast and will contain new sets, costumes and a well arranged staging. This production is another in the series of hits being given this year at the Arundel Opera theater in Kennebunkport, Me.

STERN IS SOLOIST AT TANGLEWOOD

Plays Violin Concerto of Brahms—Monteux Leads the Boston Symphony

By JOHN BRIGGS
Special to The New York Times.

LENOX, Mass., July 24—The Berkshire Festival's week-end opened tonight with a concert by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Isaac Stern as soloist in the Brahms Violin Concerto.

This is strenuous music, demanding just the superb, transcendent impetus brought to it by Mr. Stern. The violinist was in his element throughout, performing with the combination of verve and precision that is a specialty of his playing.

Mr. Stern's brilliant performance in the opening movement evoked an ovation that momentarily brought the concerto to a stop. He performed eloquently in the slow movement, and the finale was a piece of breakneck bravura that won an ovation from the audience.

When Brahms died, there were found among his effects eleven chorale-preludes (i.e., preludes on hymn-tunes), which have plagued organists ever since. Paradoxically, while on the piano they suggest something of the richness of organ tone, on the organ they merely sound muddy. Then there are problems of bringing out the inner voices, relatively easy at the piano but impossible at the organ, which does not respond in the same way to the player's touch.

Virgil Thomson, an organist of long experience who must have fretted over the Brahms preludes like everyone else, orchestrated them in 1957, and his version was played tonight. Heard one after another, unconnected by themes or key-relationships, they make a somewhat episodic impression and it is inconceivable that Brahms meant them to be performed that way.

Mr. Thomson, for one listener, scored most successfully "O Gott, Du Frommer Gott" and "Es Ist Ein' Ros' Entsprungen." On the other hand, it is surprising that a musician of Mr. Thomson's sensitivity should apply a brash orchestral tutti to "O Welt, Ich Muss Dich Lassen," the sad, melancholy resignation of which makes it the most poignant of the eleven.

Another hymn, the Scottish tune called "Dundee," of which Bach fashioned his great Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor, opened the concert, which closed with a spirited performance of Strauss' "Don Juan."

ONE HUNDRED STRINGS ON THE RESERVATION

By ALINE JEAN TREANOR

OKLAHOMA CITY.

An International Congress of Strings, 100 strong, is playing classic chamber music and string orchestra repertory this summer within the latest wilderness to pass from Indian tribal sovereignty to that of the U. S. A.: postal address—Greenleaf Lake State Park, Braggs, Okla. Players of the congress get their mail from homes in thirty-seven states of the United States and Canada.

A few decades ago Greenleaf Lake was but a slight, spring-fed stream in the Ozark foothills of Indian Territory. From time untold the park land was Indian hunting grounds, its waters, grasses, trees and underbrush palpitant with wild life.

It became Cherokee country in 1828 by treaty with the United States, but only after the Cherokees had won it in bloody disputes with the indigenous Osages. They called their journey of occupation "The Trail of Tears." Not until 1907 was the place released from tribal rule to become part of the new state of Oklahoma.

Arriving at Greenleaf with violins, violas, 'cellos and double basses instead of tomahawks, by plane and auto rather than afoot and horseback, the 1951 occupation settled in on June 15, sans war whoops, sans tears—eighty-six student players, and ten of faculty rank.

Harris Brain-Child

The Congress of Strings is a brain-child of Dr. Roy Harris, composer-in-residence at Indiana University; a native of Oklahoma and founder-director of the Congress of Strings.

The ultimate aim of the congress is conservation of symphony orchestras and symphonic music. Its immediate purpose is to interest talented youth in symphony careers and prepare them for refilling the depleted main stream of symphony players. It is projected for a stretch of ten summers.

Its godparents are three. And first is the American Federation of Musicians, whose local unions in seventy-two cities have sent hand-picked talent on full-expense scholarships. The Oklahoma Resources and Planning Board is providing park and facilities. An incorporation of friendly Oklahomans, titled Greenleaf Lake Festival, has pledged the cost of faculty salaries. Each sponsor is putting in around $35,000.

These youths, aged 15 to 21, boys and girls in almost equal number, settled to work promptly in their new environment, which has been tamed some, but not much.

Up and down river, deer still run in plenty. The river prongs teem with crappie, catfish, black bass and perch. The oak, hickory and pine woods, and berry patches are vocal with mockingbird, woodthrush, bobwhite, cardinal, wren. But the park's rustic lodge and cabins have been converted into air-conditioned dormitories, studios, classrooms, a rehearsal-recording hall.

From these, from practice sheds dotting the grass, and from the shade of almost any blackjack oak or sweetgum, issue Kreutzer exercises, Paganini caprices, Bach partitas, Beethoven sonatas, Mozart quartets and quintets, Brahms, Debussy, Ravel, to match the concerto grosso of the birds.

The Routine

Some of the young musicians are up at 5:30 A. M. to do their solitary practice. From 8 A. M. to noon, they are in orchestra rehearsal under Dr. Harris, in two shifts because there is no hall large enough to hold all at once.

Afternoons are for private lessons, sight-reading classes, small ensembles, more solo practice. They're getting practice in trouping, too. They travel in two big buses to Tulsa, Norman, Muskogee, playing concerts of the hardest kind of music to whip into smooth and eloquent ensemble—the contrapuntal forms. Of evenings, Greenleaf Lake, now a placid emerald held by a Works Project Administration dam, reflects gay swimming and boating parties.

There's another side to the story—the impact on Oklahoma. Audiences of staggering size have been turning out to hear weekly chamber music concerts by the faculty, and occasional student orchestra concerts. In Tulsa University's Skelly Stadium, the crowd jumped from 1,500 to 4,000 the first three concerts. A thousand came out on the University of Oklahoma campus at Norman. An outdoor amphitheatre had to be substituted in Oklahoma City for the original choice of a small air-conditioned theatre. There has been a big spurt in the size of Oklahoma's audience for chamber music.

The Oklahoma City concert offers a typical faculty program. The Congress pianist, Johana Harris, was at the keyboard all evening long. Her partner in the "Kreutzer" was Frank Houser, concertmaster of the San Francisco Symphony. Her colleagues in the other works were Houser; William Lincer, first violist, New York Philharmonic; Theo Salzman, first 'cellist, Pittsburgh Symphony; Victor Aitay, associate concertmaster, Chicago Symphony; Abraham Skernick, first violist, Cleveland Orchestra and Lorne Munroe, first 'cellist of the Philadelphia.

Music: Berkshire Festival Has Second Weekend

By RAYMOND MORIN

Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The second weekend of the Berkshire Festival's music shed concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra got under way last night with Pierre Monteux conducting a Brahms - headed program. There was an audience of 7,800.

Isaac Stern received an ovation for his performance of Brahms' violin concerto in D Major, Opus 77.

The balance of the program was Respighi's transcription of Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C Minor; eleven chorale preludes, Opus 122 by Brahms, orchestrated by Virgil Thomson; and Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," Opus 20.

Magnificent Music

Here was magnificently constructed music.

The Bach Passacaglia and fugue has been irresistable to several other composers who have tried to inflate and varnish the original organ score. Respighi was a wizard with instruments and he passed a firm hand over the old without desecrating original concepts.

The Brahms violin concerto is a tour-de-force that lies partly hidden behind a rich compelling orchestration. In last weekend's performance of the Tchaikovsky violin concerto, Stern played the role of impassioned poet; this time, he demonstrated the core of his musicianship and poise. Oddly enough, the overall effect was more demonstrative than has been the Tchaikovsky.

Thomason's craft and integrity were the main considerations in appraising his orchestrations of the Brahms' chorale preludes—and the door to orchestral virtuosity was opened with the Strauss "Don Juan."

'Ideal Conductor'

Monteux was the ideal conductor for this program.

His immense gifts (again the entire program, including the concerto, was conducted from memory) are as rewardingly given to Bach as to Strauss. But in the Brahms score, particularly the orchestral portions of the concerto, it was like looking through clear glass at the workings of a completely clear mind.

We had heard his concept of the Bach Passacaglia and fugue several years ago when he conducted the San Francisco Symphony at a Worcester Civic Music concert.

The Respighi is infinitely more interesting than any transcription we have heard before. The theme of the Passacaglia was a little thick in organ and low strings.

Monteux brought out the work's basic structure, but there were differences in the Respichi transcription. Certainly the solo violin sections were beautifully played by Joseph De Pasquale. There were perceptible slackenings of speed in the course of the variations, which is unusual. The fugue subjects were first offered with the utmost simplicity and clarity—then built into magnificent climaxes, layer by layer.

Coincidentally, while Stern was giving his magnificent peformance of the Brahms violin concerto, word reached us that Fritz Kreisler is seriously ill in a New York hospital.

Possibly the most remarkable feature of last night's Brahms was that it was played without rehearsal. It didn't seem to have required it.

Monteux and orchestra gave a strict, decisive introduction, laying a solid foundation for the entrance of the solo instrument. Sterns tone was full, rich, and surrounded by marvelous illustrations of musicianship and virtuosity.

The extreme difficulties of the first movement cadenza were tossed off as if they were a routine matter.

Intimate Message

Stern made an intimate message of the slow movement, remaining in that effective milieu of tenderness without sugary content. The rhythm of the finale might as well have been attached to steel girders. All through it ran splashes of technical brilliance and a warm, sensitive tone.

Virgil Thomson has neither added anything of import or detracted from the eleven chorale preludes by Brahms.

In his orchestral settings, Thomson expressed the intention of rescuing them from neglect and "rendering them available for a wider appreciation." That is a moot question unless more orchestras decide to play his transcriptions than organists in their original version.

Moods Remain Same

In any event, they seem to retain close adherence to the organ registrations. The moods remain the same, and except for the addition of English horn, bass clarinet and rather naive use of glockenspiel (little bells), they are interesting and pleasing additions to the repertory.

Changes are announced for tonight's program. In place of Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture, the Boston Symphony, conducted by Charles Munch, will play Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo," Hebraic rhapsody for cello and orchestra. Soloist will be Samuel Mayes, first cellist of the orchestra.

Serkin Piano Soloist At Tanglewood Today

Plays Brahms Concerto No. 1 With Boston Symphony Orchestra; Music of Romantic Period Next at Festival

LENOX—With Rudolf Serkin as piano soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, will be heard this afternoon in a Shed performance of Brahms's Piano Concerto No. 1 in D major, instead of Concerto No. 2 as previously announced. Today's program, beginning at 2:30, opens with Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn. Then the noted American composer, Aaron Copland, will conduct his own orchestral suite from the opera, "The Tender Land," which was performed by the Tanglewood Opera Department in 1954. There will be a student chamber music concert in the Chamber Music Hall this morning at 10.

Charles Munch, music director, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Shed on Friday night, July 31. His program will be devoted in its entirety to the Requiem of Hector Berlioz, which will be presented as a memorial to the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky who was the orchestra's music director for 25 years and who founded the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. The tenor soloist will be John McCollum and the Festival Chorus, prepared by Hugh Ross and Lorna Cooke DeVaron, will be joined by the University of Maryland Chapel Choir, Fague Springmann, conductor. Additional brass players will join the regular orchestra to form the four brass choirs which are heard in the "Dies Irae," "Tuba Mirum" and "Lacrymosa" of the great Requiem Mass.

Saturday's Berkshire Festival program will be conducted by Pierre Monteux, whose varied program will include Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony No. 4 in A major, Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto No. 1 in G minor with Rudolf Serkin as soloist, Schumann's "Manfred" Overture and the same composer's Introduction and Allegro appassionato for Piano and Orchestra (again with Rudolf Serkin). The program will close with the Prelude and Love Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

On Sunday afternoon, Aug. 2, Charles Munch will again conduct, and the soloist will be Isaac Stern, performing Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E minor. The program will open with the Fourth Symphony in E, Op. 91, by Alexander Tcherepnin. The symphony was composed in 1957 and is dedicated to Charles Munch. Dr. Munch will close the program with Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C major.

Schneider and Kirchner

Alexander Schneider, noted violinist, and Leon Kirchner, composer and pianist, will appear at the Chamber Music Concert on Wednesdy evening, July 29, at 8:30 in the Theater-Concert Hall. Mr. Kirchner is currently a member of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, in the Composition Department. Mr. Schneider, a member of the Budapest String Quartet, is also director of the Pablo Casalls Festival in Puerto Rico. They will present a sonata program including works by Mozart and Mr. Kirchner.

The Tanglewood Choir will present a program on Tuesday, July 28, at 8:30 in the Theater-Concert Hall. This concert, as well as other student concerts during the week, is open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. The regular weekly student orchestra concert on Thursday, July 30 will be presented in the Music Shed at 8:30.

A change has been announced in the Seminar in Contemporary Music scheduled for Friday, July 31, at 2:15 in the Chamber Music Hall. Robert Craft, who is prevented from coming to Tanglewood by a recent accident, will be replaced by Lukas Foss.

MODERN WORKS HEARD BY CROWD AT TANGLEWOOD

Cellist Mayes Performs Bloch; Piston Symphony Played

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX—Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra provided beautiful music Saturday night to the evident enjoyment of some 9800 persons.

Hebrew Rhapsody

Changes in the program brought cellist Samuel Mayes as soloist in Ernst Bloch's "Schelomo," a Hebrew rhapsody for "cello and orchestra." The work was played as a tribute to the composer who died last week.

It was a splendid performance, rich in tone and passionate in its depth and exaltation. Mayes' cello sang soulfully and his technical grasp of the work was unique. Mr. Munch has a distinct feeling for the work and his collaboration with the soloist resulted in a performance of towering strength and distinction.

The program opened with Walter Piston's Third Symphony. The composer was on hand to acknowledge the applause and a Tanglewood audience is always happy to welcome a composer.

Cool Evening

It was a perfect evening and quite cool, so the boxes were filled with fur-bedecked women, furs ranging from mink to rabbit.

It sems to us that Walter Piston is quite the most distinguished of present day symphonic composers. He always has something to say and he says it with superb craftsmanship and also entertainingly.

The third movement of the symphony might almost be played out of context as a concerto for orchestra, so handsomely has the composer provided for each section of the orchestra and for many of the first desk players.

Hailed as Lyricist

We prefer Piston in his quieter moments for he is a magnificent lyricist. His moments of heroics are sometimes less articulate than enthusiastic.

Mr. Munch has devoted a deal of time to the music of Piston. He understands it and his communication of it is among the best things he accomplishes.

We learned that violinist Fritz Kreisler, who has been ill in a hospital, will soon be released and is expected in Stockbridge within a week. He has spent summers at Heaton Hall for many years.

Brahms' Second

Mr. Munch closed the program with Brahms' Second Symphony instead of the scheduled First Symphony. This was done because of the length of the Bloch work. We could not hear the entire performance, but what we did hear revealed the affection with which Mr. Munch holds the work and his deep understanding of it.

There were moments of rare tonal beauty and a solidity and coloration which are characteristics of the Boston Symphony at its best. One may sometimes take exception to the Munch tempo, but the over all portrait is seldom blurred and this Saturday night performance was one of its most effective.

This afternoon the soloist is to be pianist Rudolf Serkin playing the Brahms First Piano Concerto instead of the Second Piano Concerto as was announced. The concert promises to draw a record crowd and if a rehearsal is any criterion of what is to come, the audience is in for a stupendous performance. Other works to be heard include Brahms "Variations on a Theme by Haydn" and an orchestral suite Copland has put together from his opera "The Tender Land."

Music: Brahms Weekend Ends at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The Brahms weekend at Tanglewood, second in the series of Music Shed concerts at the Berkshire Music Festival, ended yesterday afternoon with Charles Munch conducting the Boston Symhony before an audience of 9,900.

The weekend total attendance was 27,500.

A late change in the program substituted Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1 in D Minor, Opus 15, for the orginally scheduled second concerto by the same composer.

Rudolf Serkin was soloist in a superlative performance.

For those who have been "on the fence" with regard to Aaron Copland's most recent compositions, a pleasant surprise was experienced in his orchestral suite from his opera, "The Tender Land," which he conducted.

Furthermore, Copland was an ingratiating conductor. And, of course, his presence on the podium, conducting his own music, is a guarantee of authenticity. The orchestra gave him every cooperation, both at yesterday's performance and at the rehearsal Saturday morning.

Pleasant Score

"The Tender Land" is a downright pleasant score. It has a little of "El Salon Mexico" in general idiom. There are traces of the dance excerpts from "Billy the Kid" and "Rodeo" in the suite's second part, titled "Party Scene."

In the introduction, love music and "Promise of Living"" is a wealth of susceptibly attractive melody, offered in an uninvolved communicative way — and unspoiled by grating harmonies or quarreling rhythms. In the love music are recitatives for cello and woodwinds that are infectious and lightened by what sound like bird calls.

The love scene does bewail a bit lengthily at the end, but this seems to be a calculated method of reaching the final restless chords that punctuate a decisive mood.

"Party Scene" is intentionally brash, rowdy, invigorating, and a delightful mixture of dance rhythms and hefty accents. In the "Promise of Living" sequence, pastoral themes follow clean paths without offense to serenity or credulity. The movement reached its culmination in a large crescendo, leaving one with an impression of expansiveness and triumph.

This is by far the finest work we have heard from Copland in some time.

Serkin's Technique

Serkin was the magnificent musician and stolid techinician in the first Brahms piano concerto.

He is not attractive to watch, however. Exhorbitant gestures, weaving, crouching over the keyboard, looking generally overcome — and visually reacting to all facets of orchestral interludes — these would seem to be a part of his technique.

There are those who question the effectiveness or service rendered by those methods. Sometimes it is admittedly difficult to decide where the dividing line exists between showmanship and exaggeration.

It must also be granted that visual filigree does not detract one whit from the product of his musicianship.

The agreed-upon approach to the concerto by pianist and conductor was to expose its deep resources rather than place the solo instrument in the dominant role of providing a dazzling display.

Climactic Highpoints

Climactic highpoints of the opening movement were marvelous duo-efforts. There was a beautiful muted tone from the strings in the opening passages that was glorified when taken over by the piano. We've never heard more polished or sensitive tones from Serkin than in the slow movement.

At times they were of the utmost fragility, but unbroken, and filling every strand of melody with the fullest richness of every sound. The finale was tailored along heroic lines, powerful rhythms, intense dialogue between piano and orchestra, and a gradual but unrelenting drive toward climax.

The program opened with Munch conducting the orchestra in a finely intergrated performance of the Haydn-Brahms variations, opus 56A.

The excitable variations were taken at rampant speed — no problem whatsoever for such an orchestra. Munch brought out some generally concealed or neglected counterpoint between winds and low strings. Even at top speeds, the intracate syncopated accents were squarely placed without impeding progressor phrase.

Saturday Night

The Saurday night concert was heard by an audience of 9,800. Munch conducted the Boston Symphony in a comprehensive and exciting program.

An unexpected and wholly acceptable change in program was the substitution of Ernest Block's "Schelomo," Hebrew rhapsody for cello and orchestra for Brahms "Academic Festival" overture.

In Memory of Composer

The Bloch was played in memory of the composer, who died July 15. Soloist was Samuel Mayes, first cellist with the Boston Symphony.

Bloch was a contemporary who stood squarely in the middle of safe but adventurous terrain. He was an ardent scholar of Jewish music. Instead of adapting authentic Jewish melodies to his own idiosyncracies of style or dramatic indulgences, he used them wholesomely and for their own betterment.

The Boston Symphony has been championing Block's music for the past 42 years. In 1917 the archestra was conducted by Bloch in his "Three Jewish Poems."

Suite For Viola

Subsequently, the orchestra performed Bloch's Suite for Viola and "Macbeth" Interludes, "Baal Shem," "Concerto Symphonique" —and in 1938, Munch presented the first performance of Bloch's Violin Concerto, with Joseph Szigeti as soloist.

Mayes gave a superlative performance of "Schelomo." The cello's role is the voice of Solomon. It's narrative music, free in style, immensely expressive, and directly communicative.

The soloist was completely attuned to the spontaneity, verve, and intensity with which the cello part must be addresed. The statements were unfettered and declarative, and warmly toned down to the last syllable.

Gorgeous Tone

Mayes derived a gorgeous tone from the instrument and it extended into the high range where tones were just as secure and true. The orchestra gave him a flexible accompaniment, permitting him to extemporize his style at will.

There were marvelously played interludes in orchestra, particularly in woodwinds that confirmed exactly with the style extablished by the soloist.

A work of intrigue from its academic and structural factors was Walter Piston's Symphony No. 3. The composer was present to acknowledge the considerable applause that he received.

Opening Movement

This is not emotional music primarily.

The opening movement begins inauspiciously, with a rather wailing oboe solo and harp background. Strings take over with a warm melody that's promptly objected to by an element of dissonance from the rest of the orchestra.

Heavier points of interest are reached with steadfast planning, bearing out the intellectual approach we referred to. In fact, portions of the opening movement become pointedly analytical, almost to a point of dissolving interest.

We have it on the best authority that Munch insists upon playing the second movement (scherzo) faster than is the wish of the composer. At the speed it was played last night, it did prance rather impatiently but it must also be admitted that it gained in vitality with its jarring syncopation that contrasted blithely with the bucolic middle part.

Third Movement

The adagio, or third movement, is instituted with an untarnished contrived melody in strings, set to restful harmonies (not commonplace) but offset with interesting passages in harp, exceedingly well-played by Bernard Zighera.

Viorous material is the mainstay of the finale—robust rhythms and vivid tonal colors. The four-part fugue that serves as an insertion was nothing less than spectacular.

In place of the originally scheduled Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Munch conducted the orchestra in the same composer's Symphony No. 2 in D Major—probably to prevent an overly-long programme.

The third series of Tanglewood Shed concerts will begin Friday. Concentration next weekend will be on romantic composers. Friday night's concert is a Koussevitzky memorial. Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony and Festival Chorus in the Berlioz Requiem, with John McCollum as tenor soloist.

Music Review

Glorious Weekend at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE FOURTH weekend at Tanglewood was favored with the most beautiful weather the Berkshires can produce, and the Saturday evening and yesterday afternoon concerts drew near-record crowds and produced unforgettable music. Charles Munch, the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led both programs after having ceded the baton to Pierre Monteux for the Friday evening concert.

There have been few occasions at Tanglewood when two concerts packed such wonderful music. Samuel Mayes' Saturday night playing of Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo" and Rudolph Serkin's interpretation of Brahms' first piano concerto in D minor yesterday were among the most memorable solo performances that have been heard in the great Shed.

MUNCH HAD started his program with Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn and seemed to have bestowed loving sincerity on it. The orchestra sounded in superlative form. Munch took more than ample pauses between variations, but each miniature was framed in an appropriate character and the spacious mood he seemed to be in prompted him to insist on certain points of beauty as though he were in a flower garden, and, arriving at a bud of special scent, was reluctant to pass by.

Serkin used his mastery of the keyboard only to serve his poetic instincts, and between the heroic majesty of the bold themes and the fairy-touch subtlety of the more gracious passages, he drew nuances to overwhelm the spellbound audience. The excitement he raised in his bravura playing was countered by a pianissimo of unbelievable eloquence, and his inflections shaped harmonic idioms as well as melodic phrases, an achievement not only rarely accomplished but even more rarely comprehended.

BRAHMS' TWO piano concertos are written with more importance given to the orchestra than is the ordinary relationship, and Munch alternately not only allowed the soloist full liberty and solid support, but gave the orchestral sections their designed structure and substance.

One of the happy surprises of the afternoon was the performance of Aaron Copland's orchestral suite from his opera "The Tender Land," with the composer conducting. "The Tender Land" was first presented in New York five springs ago and then later that summer repeated by the unfortunately now defunct opera department of the Berkshire Music Center. Copland caught the germ for the opera in a book of the late James Agee called "Let us now praise famous men," and the libretto is credited to a mythical or pseudonymous Horace Everett.

COPLAND has taken three scenes from the opera and made a suite of three admirably contrasting movements. The first "Introduction and Love Music" is an exquisitely heartbreaking song which the orchestra played for him with faithful affection. The "Party Scene" is a boisterous, unrestrained hoedown which graphically imparts the spirit of that part of the opera even without benefit of scenery or dancing, and the finale is an earnest "Promise of Living" which is a vivid portrayal of emotional intensity and ardent nostalgia.

Rudolph Serkin

Copland's conducting was stimulating and inspiring and the orchestra reflected his provocative flights of sensitiveness ranging from deep fervor to youthfully exhilarating abandon. No cheerleader ever encouraged a team over the goal line with more immersion in his task than Copland in his "Party." He rubbed a washboard, palpitated and bounded, reached heavenward a taut-stretched left arm, and, if the audience had not also given evidence of being overjoyed with the whole suite, seemed to have enjoyed the experience himself most of all.

THE SENSATION of Saturday evening's concert was Samuel Mayes' "Schelomo." This was a change of program quickly inserted as a gesture of homage to the memory of Ernest Bloch who failed by nine days, on July 15th, to reach his 79th birthday. This Hebraic rhapsody for violoncello with orchestral accompaniment dates from the first half of Bloch's life. Mayes' performance was completely convincing and of extraordinary beauty in every way. He used his vibrant tone with authority to establish stylistic credibility. He played with unexcelled poise and breadth and created breathless awe in the throbbing, mournful Talmudic prose.

The improvisatory nature of the work calls for its reconstruction by the artist. Mayes made it an ecstatic recitation imbued constantly with drama and pathos. This was music making on the grandest scale and cello-playing beyond quibbling.

WALTER PISTON was in the audience and was called to the platform by Mr. Munch after the playing of his Symphony No. 3. This is in four movements, of which the first two are reversed from the usual order of an opening allegro followed by a slower contrast. The significance of Piston's music is not as quickly apparent as is his mastery of musical language. There is a sureness and dexterity to his writing which indicates a purpose, but which does not easily reveal imagination. This symphony was written in 1947 on commission of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. It is expertly sophisticated writing, but without palpable warmth in the section in which we were seated.

MUNCH CLOSED his program with a devoted performance of the Brahms Second Symphony, in D major. It seems incredible today that this symphony ever had a hostile audience. There is no reason why individuals may not have their likes and dislikes and staunchly support their favorites, and thus be disinterested in, even dislike this Brahms, but not any longer for the reasons it is said to have met objection at its early performances. If we speak for any faction regarding the Piston symphony, he may, we hope, take satisfaction from the experience of the Brahms which outlived indifference and protest and is now generally accepted as a lovable, gentle work full of soothing and ennobling sentiments.

The Boston Orchestra has never sounded better. We think we discern the virtues and attributes which contribute to this glorious sounding ensemble, but we also believe the new acoustic background and ceiling are factors in the effects which are reaching to the audiences attending this year's concerts. It is good that their conductor, Charles Munch, is not a predictable leader. We prefer the element of expectancy in a performance and while we may, or may not, see fit to remark on the variety of approach used in repetitions of the orchestral favorites, it exposes a desire not to abide by a pre-established formula and to substitute an element of audacity, a freshness which keeps the orchestra on the alert as much as the audience.

SERKIN HAILED AT FESTIVAL IN BRAHMS' WORK

9900 at Tanglewood Also Hear Suite Conducted By Copland

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX — The last of three week-end concerts devoted primarily to the music of Brahms drew 9900 people to Tanglewood Sunday. The three concerts drew a total of 27,500 people.

Gala Occasion

There has been great music played in the grand manner during these three concerts and Sunday afternoon's performance was no exception, aside from the fact that it was in many ways a gala occasion, for pianist Rudolf Serkin played the Brahms "Piano Concerto, No. 1 in D Minor."

The program opened with Brahms' "Variations on a Theme of Haydn" and concluded with the piano concerto. In between and quite safe was an orchestral suite which Copland had whipped up from his opera "The Tender Land." So, eyebrows were raised at this programming, but the American composer has always had his day in the sun of Tanglewood.

Brahms' Variations provide a wonderful canvas for the application of those marvelous colors of which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is capable. Mr. Munch laid them on in broad strokes. There were moments when the quieter variations seemed overcolored, but the complete performance was a superb blend of tenderness and heroics. Brahms, a master orchestral colorist, was well served.

Skilled Colorist

Mr. Copland's orchestral suite from his opera "The Tender Land" is, in some ways, more pleasant to hear than was the opera, which sometimes seemed overlong. Copland also is a skilled orchestral colorist and he imbues the love music with exquisite color and texture.

The party scene is very gay, a little hard on the ears, but it generates excitement. Incidentally as a composer-conductor, Mr. Copland is far ahead of many of his colleagues we have watched.

As we write the sound of bravos penetrate the office. They are honest reactions to a magnificent performance of the first piano concerto of Brahms by Rudolf Serkin, Mr. Munch and the orchestra.

One listened to a purely musical exposition of the work, a performance which included divine lyricism and turbulent outpourings. The lengthy orchestral introduction set the stage for what was to come.

Mr. Serkin showed much less nervous tension than at the rehearsal Saturday morning. His playing had a beautiful clarity even in the most involved passage and the orchestra was in complete harmony with an interpretation which came from both mind and heart.

One took the formidable technical problems without thinking of them, so naturally and easily did they seem to fall into place. It was a performance to be remembered.

We have seen few Springfield area people during the past four weeks, so it was pleasant to find Mr. and Mrs. George Hart sitting in front of us and to note contralto Mary Davenport and her mother from Holyoke strolling about. Miss Davenport has just returned from Zurich, Switzerland, where she is a member of the Zurich Opera Company.

Sunday Event At Tanglewood Draws 9,900

By JOHN F. KYES

LENOX — The three major concerts at Tanglewood this weekend drew 27,500, with the largest turnout of 9,900 on Sunday.

Friday evening featured Issac Stern in the Brahms Violin Concerto. Pierre Monteux, conductor, continued the Brahms emphasis in Eleven Chorale Preludes orchestrated by Virgil Thomson and brilliant works of Bach-Respighi and Richard Strauss.

Charles Munch finally included on Saturday evening's program "Schelomo," Hebrew Rhapsody for cello and orchestra, by Ernest Bloch who died on July 15. This gave a splendid opportunity to hear Samuel Mayes, first cellist. The Brahms Second Symphony replaced the First, and Walter Piston's Third Symphony remained as scheduled.

Sunday, Rudolf Serkin made his first appearance at the 1959 Berkshire Festival, playing the First Piano Concerto in D minor instead of the more popular Second, previously announced. The audience lingered to manifest its warm approval of the fare offered.

Demanding Work

Despite visual eccentricities of Serkin, hearing him adds up to a tremendous experience. This particular work demands much from orchestra and conductor. It is far from being a typical showcase of pianistic technique. Brahms started to write a symphony, later conceived it as a sonata for two pianos, before arriving at the final standard concerto form.

I loved the moods so well developed by Munch and Serkin. The Maestoso, at first filled with fateful forebodings, had moments of rich singing quality in the ensemble. The soloist's phrasings, individual but keenly-felt, alternated between vehemence and poetry.

The Adagio reminded one continually of Brahms' choral works, with direct melodic and harmonic kinship to "The Song of Fate" (Schicksalslied) and parellelisms with the "Requiem." In this lovely section, pianist and orchestra seemed to peer at times beyond the stars.

Difficult Rhythms

The final Rondo: Allegro non troppo had purposeful drive which became elaborated into difficult rhythms. Serkin made the most of passages of quiet beauty, between strong utterances which claimed his complete enthusiasm.

Strong contrast to the Brahms was provided by a Suite from Aaron Copland's opera, "The Tender Land," conducted by the composer. He was in fine fettle, and secured a devoted, warm and fresh response from the virtuoso orchestra.

Here is music which expresses America in many ways. The vital, noisy introduction, the long and beguiling themes of the Love Music, the clashing good humor of the Party Scene, with its folk inferences, all came off splendidly.

Orchestral Version

The Finale: "The Promise of Living," heard chorally at a "Tanglewood on Parade" concert, built up also in its orchestral version a stirring climax, intent on expressing the American way of life.

Munch began the concert with the Brahms Variations on a Theme of Haydn, identified as the familiar, "St. Anthony's Chorale." The first two variations seemed somewhat stiff, but there soon followed a more flowing quality. By turns the music was chromatic and pensive, rushing, bandlike, then assumed slow, eloquent triple time, and turned to steadily rapid triplets before the final solid, organlike hymn for full orchestra.

Next weekend, the orchestra will turn to a variety of romantic expressions, including works of Berlioz, Mendelssohn and Schumann.

Excellent Programs At Tanglewood Drew 27,500 On Long Weekend

Some remarkably fine programs brought ovations from Tanglewood audiences that totaled 27,500 people over the past weekend. Fine weather saw nearly 10,000 at the Music Shed and lawns of the Lenox site of the Berkshire Music Festival on Sunday afternoon.

On Friday evening, Pierre Monteux, popular and elderly guest conductor, led the Boston Symphony orchestra in a choice program, the high point of which was the difficult Brahms Violin Concerto with Isaac Stern as soloist. Mr. Stern performed with brilliant technique and a wide range of feeling, the tenderness of the adagio coming through beautifully and the whole work played with complete authority.

The concert opened with Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C Minor, with Respighi orchestration, a handsomely textured composition. Virgil Thomson's version of Brahms' eleven chorale preludes was an interesting and refreshing diversion after the powerful violin sonata, and the program ended with the romantic flourishes of "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss.

The modern syncopation of Piston, the spiritual quality of Bloch, and the grandeur of Brahms were brought forth by the Boston Symphony orchestra Saturday night.

As 9800 persons listened, Charles Munch directed the Berkshire Festival concert which moved smoothly from 20th to 19th Century music. The cool Berkshire evening nipped at music lovers who filled the shed and spotted the lawn.

The most exciting performance of the evening was Samuel Mayes' cello solo in Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo" (Solomon), Hebrew Rhapsody for Cello and Orchestra. The tribute to Bloch who died July 15 was loudly applauded and Mayes was given five curtain calls.

Luminous in effect, Mayes' playing combined with Munch's directing to make for ecstatic delivery. The deep tones of the cello were sonorous as the melodies poured out into a mixture of gypsylike rhythms, interplay by the horns, and full orchestration.

First on the program was Piston's "Symphony No. 3" with Composer Walter Piston on stage sharing honors with Munch following an exacting interpretation of the work. Each of the movements is juxtaposed in contrast to the next and played in different tempo so that each stands alone. Munch gave the symphony a zestful interpretation as he swirled the orchestra to buoyancy.

Tanglewood's bucolic setting is always perfect for Brahms' "Pastoral" Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73. Saturday night, the contemplative work with its musical description of trees, lakes and mountains was embroidered with rich tonal beauty. The violins sang sweetly through the romantic melodies directed in the grand manner by Munch.

Sunday afternoon Rudolf Serkin won tremendous applause as soloist in the Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1 in D Minor. This final concert of the "Brahms' weekend" also includes Brahms' Variations on a theme of Haydn, and Aaron Copland's suite from "The Tender Land." Charles Munch conducted.

Next weekend, the romantic period will supply music for the Tanglewood programs. On Friday night, Charles Munch will conduct Requiem by Berlioz, with John McCollum, tenor, as soloist.

On Saturday night Rudolf Serkin will play Mendelssohn's Piano Concert No. 1 and Introduction and Allegro appassionato, Op. 92 by Schumann, on a program also including Mendelssohn's Fourth Symphony, the Manfred Overture by Schumann, and the prelude and liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde" by Wagner, with Pierre Monteux conducting.

Mr. Munch will conduct on Sunday afternoon, Symphony No. 4 by Tcherepnin, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E Minor, with Isaac Stern, and Schumann's Symphony No. 2.

Violinist And Pianist At Lenox

(Special To The American)

LENOX, MASS.— The Berkshire Festival's week-end presented Isaac Stern, violinist, and Rudolf Serkin, pianist, before large audiences under the baton of Pierre Monteux and Charles Munch who led the orchestra in their accustomed finished performances.

Stern performed the Brahms "Violin Concerto" Friday night in such a brilliant opening movement that the ovation stopped the concerto for a few moments.

Serkin, playing Brahms' "Piano Concerto in D minor, No. 11" yesterday afternoon in a concert under ideal conditions before a large audience in the shed and on the lawns, scored another of the successes he has had at Tanglewood in the years he has been appearing here. Dr. Munch also conducted Brahms' "Variations on a Theme of Haydn" and Aaron Copland conducted his own "Suite from The Tender Land." Saturday night's concert with Munch conducting featured the music of Brahms and drew the usual large Saturday evening audience that makes its way here when the weatherman cooperates for ideal listening.

The programs for this third week of the Festival will have Munch conducting the Berlioz "Requiem" at the Koussevitzky Memorial Concert on Friday evening with John McCollum, tenor, soloist. Concerts Saturday and Sunday will present music of Schumann and Mendelssohn with a bit of Wagner and Tcherepnin. Serkin will be heard at the piano Saturday night in Schumann's "Manfred Overture and Concert Piece, Op. 92" with Monteux conducting. The rest of the program will include Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony and Piano Concerto No. 1" with Serkin as soloist and Wagner's "Prelude and Love Death from Tristan."

For Isaac Stern's return on Sunday afternoon the violinist will play the Mendelssohn "Violin Concerto." The program will include music of Tcherepnin and Schumann's "Symphony No. 2."

Weekend Concerts in New England

Rudolf Serkin and Samuel Mayes Soloists at Tanglewood

By Robert W. Dumm

Lenox, Mass.

A mountain breeze cleared the air for keen listening at Tanglewood over the weekend. As we listened to Saturday's and Sunday's concerts, it seemed that the Boston Symphony was already much at home under its new roof, the Saarinen sound canopy, and had learned to rely on it to reflect the finest shadings of ensemble playing. There was a special finesse and brilliance in everything it did: music of two viable contemporaries, a generous helping of Brahms, and two solo performances that rose to the level of visionary beauty.

Very little of the grand persuasion that lies in Walter Piston's Pulitzer Prize - winning Third Symphony can be guessed from the composer's modest program notes, which concentrate on mapwork. The symphony unfolds a large plan, proportioned to large musical ideas. The mood is earnest, and the sound rich in strings. After the whip-cracking assertions of the Scherzo, the music settles into a long Adagio, which starts with supplication and ends with resignation, a gamut which places Piston in the class of the best tonal architects.

The orchestra responded deeply to Charles Munch's direction, especially the sleek and shining strings. This is the twelfth birthday of the piece, and one hopes so genuine an utterance will be played for a long time to come.

Another established contemporary, Aaron Copland, stepped onto the podium to conduct his suite from his opera, "The Tender Land." The music is direct and effective, folksy as calico, and the composer's reading gave it the assurance of imagination and proven experience.

Incidentally, it was no surprise to find the author of many successful ballets to be so alive kinetically, on and off the podium. He conveys this bounce through loose and flexible hands and an infectious smile. In the Party Scene he had many a toe tapping in the dust, and many a face mirroring the broad grin of this wonderful caller-of-tunes. When his hands at last came to rest, there was a burst of applause from the delighted audience.

Saturday's high point came when Samuel Mayes entered, took up his cello, closed his eyes, and played us right into the heart of sorrow. The music was Ernst Bloch's "Schelomo," a rhapsody on Hebrew melodies; the occasion—the passing of this composer on July 15.

Out of his knowing and careful handling of his instrument, out of his command of musical rhetoric and his winging, radiant tone, Mr. Mayes compounded such a vision as to bring 6,000 listeners to their feet in one heartfelt gesture of ovation. This was shared by his colleagues in the orchestra for their richly inspired accompaniment. The masterful details get lost in the overpowering singleness of impression; the sobbing slurred tones, the powder-fine high pitches, the unbroken calm of deep reflection. It was a tribute to the performer, to the composer, and to the rare understanding that can commute notes to philosophy.

Hardly less moving was Rudolph Serkin's performance of the solo part of Brahms' Piano Concerto in D minor. This kindly and deferential man comes onto the stage, seats himself quietly, remains quiet through the long introduction, and then unleashes a dynamic will that grips his listeners in astonished attention and nearly shakes him off the piano stool. With Serkin, too, we cannot help but be awakened kinesthetically, but each movement serves a commanding musical intelligence.

What makes his playing so strong is that his musical ideas are beyond the means of the piano, or of any single instrument. He uses his instrument entirely to serve those ideas, and not the other way around.

MUSIC

TANGLEWOOD

Berkshire Festival

By ELINOR HUGHES

The third week-end of the 22nd season of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood proved to be an eventful one, filled with surprises, which were interesting or pleasant or both, and with weather which, beginning with the humidity of Friday, wound up with two of the most glorious days imaginable, such as you find only in the Berkshires.

For those who have not been to Tanglewood this summer, but who may go this week or next season, something new and very interesting has been added: the new stage canopy in the Shed, a memorial to Edward Hawes Talbot given by his wife and designed by Eero Saarinen & Associates of Detroit. Built of waterproof plywood and colored a dark gray it lines the stage and suspends its airy triangles—which give the illusion of being about to take flight—over the first rows of seats.

Improved Quality

From the center of the Shed, a little more than half way back, the acoustics were beautifully balanced, and I am told that there is a great improvement in the quality of the sound heard by listeners sitting on the lawn outside. On Friday night, in the still, hot air, bemused insects danced in the light, weaving their way in and out of the triangles.

The discomfort of the night for the musicians can only be guessed at, but the evening was one of unadulterated musical delight. With Pierre Monteux as guest conductor and Isaac Stern as soloist in the Brahms Violin Concerto in D major, and other works including the Bach Pasacaglia and Fugue in C minor, orchestrated by Respighi, Strauss' "Don Juan" and Virgil Thomson's Orchestrations of Brahms' Eleven Chorale Preludes, Op. 22, it was an evening of familiar pleasures and rare experience.

Mr. Stern received an ovation after the first movement of the concerto and an even greater one at the close of the work, and such feeling, sensitive and beautiful musicianship deserved it. The Thomson orchestrations of the Chorale Preludes, which have not been heard before at these concerts for, I believe, in Boston, were a series of short, intensely felt and intimate exercises in counterpoint, all devotional in mood and very moving.

Saturday night's program which, like Sunday afternoon's, was conducted by Mr. Munch, was changed to permit the including of Ernest Bloch's "Schelomo," as a memorial to the gifted composer from Geneva who made his home here for so many years and died 12 days ago on the eve of his 79th birthday. It replaced the previously announced Academic Festival Overture by Brahms.

The second change was a substitution of Brahms' Symphony No. 2 for the previously announced Symphony No. 1, the only work remaining of the original program being Walter Piston's Symphony No. 3. This composition receiving a lively, lucid and sympathetic performance by the orchestra, and was greeted with the utmost cordiality by the audience, which was not just being polite, any more than I am when I say that this symphony, a Pulitzer Prize winner, becomes more enjoyable with each hearing. Mr. Piston was brought out repeatedly by Mr. Munch following the performance.

The Brahms No. 2 received an eloquent, affectionate and rather leisurely traversal, and "Schelomo" was played, or so it seemed, with affection and regret for a composer whose rich and colorful compositions have contributed so much to the pleasure of Boston Symphony hearers over the years.

Fine Attendance

Yesterday afternoon, a gloriously beautiful day which inspired very fine attendance, Mr. Munch substituted the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1 for the scheduled Brahms Concerto No. 2, but otherwise adhered to the program previously planned. The Variations on a Theme by Haydn led off in fine style, and this was followed by Aaron Copland's spirited conducting of a suite of his opera, "The Tender Land."

Mr. Copland is wonderfully happy with Americana, and the three-part suite was warm, melodiuos and filled with a spirit of sturdy optimism and a love for the land. Suggestions of a square dance bring back memories of "Rodeo," but I didn't feel that the composer is reeating himself: he just likes American folk dance rhythms.

Rudolf Serkin was soloist in the Brahms Concerto, and his interpretation of this magnificent work suffers no loss in repetition but is rather enriched each time he plays it. The orchestra supplemented him superbly, and the audience responded with rapt devotion and great enthusiasm at the close.

Attendance for the week end came to 27,500, with the great number of persons present yesterday afternoon.

Serkin Is Soloist in Brahms Work— Copland Leads Suite From Opera

By JOHN BRIGGS

Special to The New York Times.

LENOX, Mass., July 26— Two special features of this afternoon's Berkshire Festival concert by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were the appearances of Rudolf Serkin as soloist in the Brahms D minor Piono Concerto, and of Aaron Copland, conducting the Suite from his opera "The Tender Land."

The combination of Messrs. Serkin and Munch in the Brahms Concerto was an exciting one. A sense of impending drama was implicit, as it should be, in the opening tutti. Mr. Serkin's playing of the solo part was that of a fine pianist in top form.

His playing of the opening movement and of the finale had impressive dramatic power. In the slow movement, Mr. Serkin showed how eloquently and lyrically he can make the piano sound. It was an impressive performance of this exacting work.

Although Mr. Copland's opera in theatre performance was felt by some observers to lack dramatic vitality, the Suite he has fashioned from it is an interesting and well-constructed work. Its three movements are well contrasted. The lyric opening is followed by one of the merriest of Mr. Copland's cowboy tunes, with a broad, soaring, grandiose conclusion.

It is always interesting to hear a composer conduct his own music, and Mr. Copland and the Boston Symphony players collaborated in performance like the old friends they are.

The concert opened with a spirited performance of the Brahms "Haydn" Variations.

At last night's concert, in memory of Ernest Bloch, his "Schelomo" for 'cello and orchestra was played by Samuel Mayes, the orchestra's first 'cellist, under Mr. Munch's direction. From Mr. Mayes' playing few would have guessed that it represented a last-minute program switch and that the soloist had had only four days in which to prepare for the performance.

Mr. Mayes' brilliant playing of the solo 'cello part earned him a noisy demonstration, including the unusual encomium of a standing ovation from his colleagues in the orchestra.

Equal enthusiasm greeted Walter Piston when the composer came on stage after the performance of his Third Symphony, which opened last night's concert. The evening's music ended with a spirited performance of the Brahms Second Symphony.

This is just about the greenest summer I can remember. Everywhere our weekend travels have taken us, my wife Beatrice and I have found the roads bordered with impenetrable walls of luxuriant foliage—foliage so dense that it presents a solid front of varying shades of green, resembling cliffs fashioned of tons of emeralds and jade into which Mother Nature has carved an elegant tracery of leaves.

Never have we seen so many different hues of green as those with which Lady Summer is arraying her leafy children this year. They range from the palest of pastel greens to the glossy darkness of the deepest and richest of emerald colorings. It seems that we find a new tint of green foliage loveliness at every turning of the many roads we travel.

Loveliest of the greens that glow in the gowns of Lady Summer's slim and graceful forest daughters—and Beatrice and I are agreed on this point—are those that cascade from the dainty shoulders of weeping willows that curtsey to each other beside the silver ribbons of Valley roads. They're a blending of shades and tintings that defy description and their colorings vary with the changing light of sunny summer days.

At dawning, the willows wear gowns of pale translucent green, into which have been woven the most exquisite filigrees of silver. At midmorning, sunlight transforms the silver traceries into intricate patterns of antique gold, and—at high noon—the willows don sheer robes of Jade-green from which the gleam of precious metals is absent altogether.

When summer skies are darkened with the threat of rain, the willows wear garments of a dark and somber loveliness as they tremble in the pathway of the storm king's might. But when old Sol finally breaks through the clouds to send his sunbeams pirouetting through meadows covered with lacy counterpanes of diamond dew, the willows weep with delight, shedding pale green tears of happiness that sparkle like the foaming crests of ocean waves in the light of the redeeming sun. Those are the changing lovelinesses of the costumes of summer's weeping willows that we've admired as we've explored our favorite Valley roads in every kind of weather. They have been wondrous costumes to see.

We journeyed to Tanglewood of a recent evening to escape the oppressive heat of the city and to enjoy one of the magnificent shed concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

As is usually the case when we travel to Tanglewood, we planned our departure to permit us plenty of time to enjoy a leisurely trip through the summertime beauty of the Berkshires and to spend an hour or two over dinner at one of the many charming dining places which border nearly every approach to the fabled festival land of Western Massachusetts.

It required but 35 minutes of travel time to journey from the West Springfield entrance of the Massachusetts Turnpike to the pretty town of Lee, where we discovered that we still had a little more than two hours to spare before concert time. So we continued on to Canaan, N. Y., to enjoy a preconcert snack at the Pyrenees Restaurant where the French cuisine is superb and where one is almost certain to meet friends from the Greater Springfield area.

Louis and Betty Chevallier, proprietors of the Pyrenees, were as happy to see us as we were to see them and Louis informed us that he had popped a cheese souffle into the oven when he saw our car turn into his driveway. That souffle was out of this world in taste and texture and we would have ordered seconds if we hadn't remembered that we'd have to hurry on our way if we were to be on time for the Tanglewood concert.

"Come again soon," Louis invited as we took our leave and we hope we can accept his invitation before the summer ends. What with one thing and another popping up to claim our time, we're lucky if we get up to the Pyrenees once each year.

Leaving the Pyrenees and driving as fast as the law allows, we arrived at Tanglewood just as the warning bell advised music lovers that they had only a few minutes in which to find their seats before concert time. But we didn't hurry. We had decided to listen to the music of the Boston Symphony on the lovely lawns of the music festival center where there are no reserved seats and where a million star lanterns shine down upon thousands of informally clad music lovers.

There I unfolded and set up a pair of aluminum-framed lawn chairs, wrapped Beatrice in a warm wool car robe, lighted a cigaret and settled back to enjoy the evening's concert.

"What a delightful way to listen to a concert," Beatrice commented as we watched stars twinkle in the night purpled canopy of the heavens and listened to the glorious music of a Brahms Symphony. And it was a delightful way to pass an evening. It had been excessively warm in the city, but it was cool almost to the point of being cold at Tanglewood. Not uncomfortably so, though, for we had had the good sense to wear warm clothing and take a thermos jug of hot coffee along with us.

There is something especially enchanting about Tanglewood—or perhaps it's a combination of things, like the pleasant roads that wend their way through the Berkshires to the site of the great symphony concerts; the excitement of mingling with music lovers from far places; the soft light that glows in the heart of the music shed, radiating its rays to the fringe of the shell to silhouette long rows of rapt listeners in its golden light; the murmur of the muted voices of breezes through the treetops; the mystery that surrounds shadowy figures that cross and recross swathes of moonlight; and the soothingly majestic music of the Boston Symphony, casting its spell over reverent listeners. Those are the things that have endeared Tanglewood to visitors from far places, creating enduringly beautiful memories within their grateful hearts.

The hands of my watch stood at the hour of eleven when we gathered together our things and headed for the crowded Tanglewood parking area at concert's end. The roofs of parked cars stretched away almost as far as the eye could see. But the vehicles didn't remain immobile for very long, for a hard-working team of traffic officers and State Troopers soon had them unsnarled and on the way to their various destinations.

I don't think we personally were held up in the parking lot for more than ten minutes before we were on our way to the Massachusetts Turnpike and a fast journey home. According to our timing, it took us 55 minutes to complete the journey from Tanglewood to the West Springfield exit of the Turnpike—a trip that would have taken a good deal longer in pre-Turnpike days. The new throughway has paid dividends in comfort and convenience which are becoming more and more appreciated by travelers as time goes on.

Last Sunday was bright and sunny and a perfect day for antiquing, so Beatrice and I set out to make a tour of the antique shops of Our Valley in the early hours of afternoon. We journeyed first to Brimfield, where we paused to visit with our auctioneer friend, Gordon Reid, who gave Beatrice some valuable pointers on how to recognize worthwhile antiques and showed her an exceptionally fine dinner service of Havilland Limoges china which he and Mrs. Reid have spent 14 years in assembling.

"It's wonderful china and complete sets are not easily come by," Gordon told her, "especially sets which retain a full complement of tea cups. Tea cups are items which are frequently broken from usage. Hence, while you can sometimes find an almost complete set of Limoges, the chances are that it won't contain anywhere near its full service of tea cups and—more than likely—plates will be missing, too."

We told Gordon about a set of Limoges china we had admired at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Fontaine of Springfield, explaining that its classic lines and elegant patterning of white and gold had appealed to us much more strongly than other sets of the china we've seen. We also explained that the Fontaine's Limoges service not only has tea cups but a complete set of coffee cups, too—something we have yet to see in other sets of the delicate china.

"It sounds like an unusually fine set of china," Gordon said, "and I'm sure it is." Then he advised, "If I were you, I'd take my time about shopping for a Limoges dinner service. They were made in hundreds of patterns and you'll want to be sure you find one with a design that pleases you. Otherwise, you're likely to purchase the first set that comes along, only to find one you like better later on. We took our time about collecting the set we have and we're glad we did. It's exactly what we want and we're pleased with it." It was good advice and we listened to it.

We were treated to the sight of one of the most unusual items of early Americana we've ever seen during our tour of Valley antique shops last Sunday. It was an ancient leather bucket which antique dealer Ray Murphy of Florence had picked up somewhere in his travels. At first glance, we were sure it was an old fire bucket from one of the old steamboats that once plied the Connecticut River. But, examining it closely, we discovered the bucket was fitted with a curiously-wrought, tight-fitting brass lid that could be tightly locked in place by means of a very old, but still efficient securing device. The presence of the lid ruled out the possibility that the item might possibly be an old fire bucket.

"Tell me what that bucket was used for and I'll give it to you," Ray offered, confident that we didn't have the faintest idea as to the bucket's purpose.

"It's a primitive sort of container for cooling milk," I ventured hopefully.

"Or maybe it's an early American type of sewing basket," Beatrice appended.

"Nope, it's neither," Ray said. "It's a bucket in which powder for the cannon of the armies of the American Revolution was carried. I've never seen anything like it. How it has survived in such remarkably good condition is a mystery to me."

Examining the bucket more closely, it was easy to see that it had been devised for the carrying of gunpowder, for it couldn't possibly have served any other purpose. As I held it in my hand I could hear the rumble of distant drums and almost see the smoke-wreathed battlefields of Yorktown and Bunker Hill. I could visualize smoke-begrimed patriots, hastily loading the red-hot breeches of death-dealing cannon, and hear the battle cries of sturdy farmers as they harried and harrassed retreating files of red-coated British troops.

Ray guessed what was taking place in my mind. "How'd you like to hear some of the stories that old bucket could tell?" he asked.

"I'm hearing them right now," I replied. And I was, for the old bucket needed no voice to help it recite the litany of battles in which it had figured. Its very presence invoked vivid mental images of the birth of a nation. It was an experience I'm not likely to soon forget and I'm glad I had the opportunity to examine the mutely eloquent relic of the great American war for Independence.

Serkin Brilliant At Tanglewood

Pianist Gives Brahms Concerto At Lenox

At the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., last Sunday, July 26, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Charles Munch, gave an outstanding performance of the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 1, aided immeasurably by the brilliant playing of Rudolf Serkin. The usual polished performance by the orchestra was heightened by Mr Serkin's eloquent interpretation of this lovely, moving work.

At Tanglewood one is used to the apogee of musical perfection, but last Sunday's whole performance was like a finished product without a flaw. The program opened with the Brahms Variations on a Theme of Haydn, interpreted with both warmth and spirit by the orchestra. The fine conducting of Mr Munch brought forth the eloquence of this spirited piece.

Quite a pleasant surprise, and a welcome one, too, was the appearance of Aaron Copland to conduct his Orchestral Suite from the Opera, "The Tender Land." To some great lovers of modern music, the first part of the first movement of this daring piece is the ultimate; to others, blatant cacophony. But all musi clovers the world over can agree that the Party Scene in the second movement contains the liveliest of Mr Copland's cowboy tunes which carries forward to the exciting conclusion of the third movement.

Mr Serkin's part came after the intermission, and from the first it was evident that he was to give one of his most exciting performances. One can cavil with the sometimes somewhat startling gestures of "Concert Greatest," but after Mr Serkin got into the concerto all gymnastics and grimaces were forgiven. Of particular moment was the gay rondo in the third movement of this piano concerto, which may answer for some time to come those who think that jazz and off-the-beat music is the invention of the twentieth century.

The huge crowd at Tanglewood that afternoon bravoed Mr Serkin, Mr Munch, and the orchestra at the end of this excellent, memmorable concert. —— G.M.

Tanglewood July 25, 26
by A. C. S.

A change in the weather and a change in the program were tremendously effective at Tanglewood Saturday evening. The program change came as a memorial to Ernest Bloch who died on July 15th. Samuel Mayes, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared as soloist in Bloch's Hebrew Rhapsody, "Schelomo." Mr. Mayes' playing was not only technically brilliant but was filled with obviously heart-felt emotion. No more fitting tribute could have been offered than this truly exceptional performance by both soloist and orchestra.

In fact, the orchestra has rarely sounded better. Charles Munch gave spirited readings of Brahms' Symphony No. 2 and Walter Piston's Symphony No. 3. The latter work, now twelve years old, has assuredly earned its place in the regular orchestral repertoire. Witty as well as serious, and beautifully constructed, the present performance of the symphony seemed to please the composer (who was warmly applauded) as much as the audience.

Rudolf Serkin, as soloist in the Piano Concerto No. 1 by Brahms, gave what can only be described as an heroic performance Sunday afternoon. The exacting difficulties of the piece seemed a mere nothing to this artist. The enormity of sound and the dramatic impact of the work were at times almost overpowering.

Aaron Copland was also on hand to conduct his Suite from "The Tender Land". Taking the best from his original score, Copland has fashioned a well-balanced composition which presents these passages in far better light than the opera afforded.

Tanglewood, July 24
By E. G. B.

Isaac Stern, in his second appearance this season as solo violinist at Tanglewood, and Pierre Monteux, the grand old man, as guest conductor, drew an ovation from the crowds last Friday night.

The major work on the program was Brahms' Violin Concerto. The enthusiasm of the audience was not only in recognition of the beautiful results produced by this eminent pair of musicians and the golden Boston orchestra, it was also due to their achievement in overcoming the severe handicap of the weather. The humidity was so hard on the instruments that Mr. Stern had to contrive to re-tune his violin three times during the first movement of the Brahms.

There were other evidences of difficulty for all the performers, but such a group of troupers overcame its problems.

Under the circumstances it was not surprising that the extra spontaneity and inspirational quality that were present the week before at Sterns' first appearance were lacking.

The program was a varied one beginning with Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor arranged by Respighi. The intentions of the original were faithfully adhered to even in the organ qualities of the tones.

After the concerto, another Brahms work, Eleven Chorale Preludes, arranged by Virgil Thomson were presented. Here the original spirit of the music was also maintained in the transcription. The program ended with a songful and impassioned reading of Strauss' tone poem Don Juan.

Second Thoughts On Music

Stern, Serkin, Monteux Week-End Concert Stars

Appearance of Famous Conductor Adds Luster; Munch and Boston Symphony Orchestra at Peak Form in Stunning Performances

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX—Isaac Stern and Rudolf Serkin were the particular stars of the three week-end concerts devoted to the music of Johannes Brahms. The appearance of Pierre Monteux added luster to the week end which also found Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony players at peak form.

Pure Orchestra

The Friday evening, July 24, program conducted by Monteux contained some choice works. It opened with a stunning performance of the splendid arrangement by Ottorino Respighi of Bach's "Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor." Respighi did not seek to maintain organ effects, but made it a purely orchestral work.

Then there was our first hearing of the "Eleven Chorale Preludes" by Brahms as orchestrated by Virgil Thomson. The chorale preludes for organ were elegantly orchestrated by Thomson. The texture was transparent and seldom were the melodies forced to succumb to overdressing. It was all in perfect taste and as played by the orchestra a veritable tonal delight. We should like to hear them again.

Isaac Stern was at his most rewarding as he addressed himself to the Brahms' violin concerto. He was handsomely supported by the orchestra and there seemed to be a perfect mutuality between violinist and conductor. The Adagio, one of the most beautiful ever written, was played with superb depth and artistic feeling and it was never allowed to become cloying. Stern can toss off the most involved passages with ease and clarity.

Mr. Monteux concluded the program with an earthy, brilliant performance of Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan." The venerable conductor understood well the temperament of the ebuliant "Don" and the performance had gaiety, dash and a bit of nostalgia.

Towering Heights

The recent death of Ernest Bloch caused changes in Saturday night's program for Mr. Munch chose to program Bloch's "Schelomo," a work for cello and orchestra. With Samuel Mayes as cellist, the performance was little short of magnificent. It had dignity, strength and reached towering heights. Mayes is a great artist and makes his cello sing like a human voice. Conductor and cellist were in complete accord and a fine balance was maintained.

Walter Piston's third symphony was appropriately placed on this program. Surely he is the most significant American symphony composer. The work has real melodic appeal, particularly the Adagio which is rich enough in content to be taken out of context and used as a concerto for orchestra. The composer was present to hear the performance and that always pleases a Tanglewood audience. The concert concluded with a well integrated performance of Brahms' second symphony. The first symphony was abandoned in favor of the second because of the length of the Bloch work.

Sunday afternoon was a gala concert because of the presence of Rudolf Serkin playing Brahms' first piano concerto. The whole performance was just as it should have been. Mr. Munch started things with a beautifully modulated performance of the "Variations On a Theme of Haydn." The clarity of this performance enabled us to marvel anew at the ingenuity and imagination of Brahms as a composer in this form.

Aaron Copland is always certain of having one or more of his works played during a Berkshire Festival. This time he was safely snuggled in between the "Variations" and the piano concerto. He had whipped up an orchestral suite from his opera "The Tender Land" and he directed the performance. As was to be expected it was a clever piece of writing and, to us, it was to be preferred to the opera. Incidentally, Copland is a much better orchestra conductor than are most of his colleagues whom we have heard.

Serkin and his instrumental colleagues under the direction of Mr. Munch reached a perfect accord during the performance of Brahms' first piano concerto. The lengthy introduction set the pace. Serkin was in rare form, much less nervous than he had seemed during rehearsal. His softest phrases were crystal clear, even far outside the music Shed and to the bravura passages he brought unsuspected strength. The performance always moved ahead, there was no lagging and at the conclusion the Shed rang with bravos which were truly deserved.

Students in Stride

The Student Orchestra has hit its stride and last Thursday night provided a delectable performance of Faure's Melli-sande" under the direction of Charles Munch. It was a delicate, beautifully shaded performance, one of the best we have ever heard from a Student Orchestra. There was always a splendid performance of the first movement of the Beethoven "Concerto No. 5 in E flat major."

The pianist was Eugenia Hyman and the conductor was Thomas Griswold. Young Mr. Griswold is, we believe, a member of the music department of Williams College. He has learned a lot about conducting since we last heard him and the concerto was well served by pianist and conductor. Miss Hyman provided some fine touches and a penetrating interpretation.

A Look at the Arts

By E.J.D.

Our recent busman's holiday took us to Tanglewood and to the Stratford (Ontario) Shakespeare Festival. Concerning the attractions of the latter, we have reported at some length in a special story.

As for the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, which ended its 22d season on Aug. 3, the three programs we attended were most rewarding. Perhaps the highlight of the three concerts was Isaac Stern's brilliant work in Brahms' "Violin Concerto in D Minor," with Pierre Monteux conducting the Boston Symphony. Mr. Stern offered a reading that had fire, spirit, and genuine poetry.

EARL J. DIAS

Another highlight was Rudolf Serkin's performance on Brahms' "Piano Concerto No. 1," which, personally, we do not like so much as the same composer's second piano concerto. The first has always struck us as somewhat wild and woolly. However, its technical demands were skillfully met by Mr. Serkin, whose flair for Brahms is well known.

For us, a third highlight was the premiere performance of Aaron Copland's "Suite from 'The Tender Land,'" an excellent orchestration of some selections from the Copland opera of several seasons ago, with the composer conducting.

The suite is notable for a first and third movement of great lyrical beauty and a third movement, one of the liveliest things Mr. Copland has ever written, based on folk song motifs and romicking its merry way through 15 minutes of contagiously rhythmical musical high jinks.

Before closing this brief Tanglewood report, we should mention the remarkable solo work accomplished by the Boston Symphony's first cellist, Samuel Mayes, in the late Ernest Bloch's Hebrew rhapsody for cello and orchestra, "Schelomo." Mr. Munch unexpectedly scheduled this selection as a memorial tribute to the composer who died last month. Although Mr. Mayes had had the benefit of only four rehearsals with the orchestra, he gave us a splendid reading—beautifully-toned, brilliantly romantic.

Provincetown Symphony Offers Concert Tuesday

John O. Crane informs us that the annual Frances Anita Crane Scholarship concert will be presented on Tuesday night at 8:30 in the Lawrence High School Memorial Auditorium, Falmouth. The Provincetown Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Joseph Hawthorne, will perform works by Bach, Vivaldi, Cimarosa and Mozart. Soloists will be oboist Ronald Roseman and soprano Joan Brainerd.

Winner of the scholarship award this year is John William Taber of Marion. Mr. Taber will study at the New England Conservatory of Music.

Afterthoughts on Falmouth's 'Auntie Mame'

Constance Carpenter, best known to American audiences for her role of Anna in "The King and I" (she succeeded the late Gertrude Lawrence in the New York company) tried her hand at playing Patrick Dennis' peripatetic and ageless "Auntie Mame" at Falmouth last week.

Miss Carpenter is an experienced actress who knows her way about the stage. Unfortunately, though, she is not quite right for the wonderfully eccentric Auntie, chiefly because she seems to lack a genuine flair for farce and lunacy. It is this necessary flair for lunacy that Rosalind Russell, who created the role on Broadway, possesses to so entertaining a degree.

Because Miss Carpenter is not really adept at slapstick, the deficiences of the play, which Jerome Lawrence and Robert E. Lee fashioned from Mr. Dennis' novel, were blatantly obvious. After all, the Lawrence-Lee adaptation is little more than a series of blackouts—notable for a sort of comic strip exaggeration and a type of humor that is as elementary and as obvious as a comedian's pratfall. Consequently, the play lacks continuity—a fact that was obscured somewhat on Broadway by Miss Hussell's engagingly frantic performance.

Be it noted that Miss Carpenter was an excellent Anna in "The King and I." The reasons for her success in that role were obvious even as she attempted to portray the fabulous Auntie, for Miss Carpenter, in episodes involving tenderness and warm emotion (notably in her affectionate exchanges with her small nephew) was most effective. But she never quite succeeded in making Auntie the amiable lunatic that she must be if the play is to be amusing and rewarding.

Concerning Andy Williams and Richard Nixon

Summer TV has been every bit as bad as we thought it would be. The incessant reruns have been as unappetizing as cold gravy, imagination and originality seem to have gone to the beach for the warm-weather months, and even the horse-opera heroes have seemed slower on the draw and even more imbecilically laconic than ever.

Among the new programs this Summer (and they have been as scarce as sunny weather), one of the few to be consistently entertaining is the Wednesday night show presided over by singer Andy Williams as the Summer replacement for Garry Moore.

Mr. Williams is as relaxed as Perry Como. In addition, like Como, he can warble a song pleasantly and with seeming effortlessness. His small talk is engaging, he keeps his variety show moving well, he handles his guests with charm and ease, and he is appropriately unobtrusive.

In fact, Mr. Williams is one of the few Summer performers whom we would not mind having around when the cold weather sets in.

While we are on the subject of Summer TV, we might mention that NBC's airing last week of filmed excerpts from Vice-President Richard Nixon's recent visit to Russia made for an lively and informative program.

Contemporary playwrights might learn a lesson in effectively dramatic dialogue from the spirited exchanges between Mr. Nixon and Nikita Khrushchev. From the viewpoint of drama criticism (after all, politics is not the concern of this column), both Mr. Nixon and Mr. Khrushchev impressed us as consummate showmen—masters of timing and inflection. And the elements of drama were implicit in their meeting—the rough, tough, hooliganish old propagandist, Khrushchev, versus the youthful-looking, clean-cut, clearly-spoken Nixon.

And for those who like plenty of sentiment in their TV viewing, Nixon's reception in Poland was heartwarming and emotionally stirring. Excellent shots of the facial expressions of many of the Poles in the enormous welcoming crowds told a revealing story.

Tanglewood July 25, 26
by A. C. S.

A change in the weather and a change in the program were tremendously effective at Tanglewood Saturday evening. The program change came as a memorial to Ernest Bloch who died on July 15th. Samuel Mayes, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared as soloist in Bloch's Hebrew Rhapsody, "Schelomo." Mr. Mayes' playing was not only technically brilliant but was filled with obviously heart-felt emotion. No more fitting tribute could have been offered than this truly exceptional performance by both soloist and orchestra.

In fact, the orchestra has rarely sounded better. Charles Munch gave spirited readings of Brahms' Symphony No. 2 and Walter Piston's Symphony No. 3. The latter work, now twelve years old, has assuredly earned its place in the regular orchestral repertoire. Witty as well as serious, and beautifully constructed, the present performance of the symphony seemed to please the composer (who was warmly applauded) as much as the audience.

Rudolf Serkin, as soloist in the Piano Concerto No. 1 by Brahms, gave what can only be described as an heroic performance Sunday afternoon. The exacting difficulties of the piece seemed a mere nothing to this artist. The enormity of sound and the dramatic impact of the work were at times almost overpowering.

Aaron Copland was also on hand to conduct his Suite from "The Tender Land". Taking the best from his original score, Copland has fashioned a well-balanced composition which presents these passages in far better light than the opera afforded.

Tanglewood, July 24
By E. G. B.

Isaac Stern, in his second appearance this season as solo violinist at Tanglewood, and Pierre Monteux, the grand old man, as guest conductor, drew an ovation from the crowds last Friday night.

The major work on the program was Brahms' Violin Concerto. The enthusiasm of the audience was not only in recognition of the beautiful results produced by this eminent pair of musicians and the golden Boston orchestra, it was also due to their achievement in overcoming the severe handicap of the weather. The humidity was so hard on the instruments that Mr. Stern had to contrive to re-tune his violin three times during the first movement of the Brahms.

There were other evidences of difficulty for all the performers, but such a group of troupers overcame its problems.

Under the circumstances it was not surprising that the extra spontaneity and inspirational quality that were present the week before at Sterns' first appearance were lacking.

The program was a varied one beginning with Bach's Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor arranged by Respighi. The intentions of the original were faithfully adhered to even in the organ qualities of the tones.

After the concerto, another Brahms work, Eleven Chorale Preludes, arranged by Virgil Thomson were presented. Here the original spirit of the music was also maintained in the transcription. The program ended with a songful and impassioned reading of Strauss' tone poem Don Juan.

Second Thoughts On Music

Stern, Serkin, Monteux Week-End Concert Stars

Appearance of Famous Conductor Adds Luster; Munch and Boston Symphony Orchestra at Peak Form in Stunning Performances

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX—Isaac Stern and Rudolf Serkin were the particular stars of the three week-end concerts devoted to the music of Johannes Brahms. The appearance of Pierre Monteux added luster to the week end which also found Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony players at peak form.

Pure Orchestra

The Friday evening, July 24, program conducted by Monteux contained some choice works. It opened with a stunning performance of the splendid arrangement by Ottorino Respighi of Bach's "Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor." Respighi did not seek to maintain organ effects, but made it a purely orchestral work.

Then there was our first hearing of the "Eleven Chorale Preludes" by Brahms as orchestrated by Virgil Thomson. The chorale preludes for organ were elegantly orchestrated by Thomson. The texture was transparent and seldom were the melodies forced to succumb to overdressing. It was all in perfect taste and as played by the orchestra a veritable tonal delight. We should like to hear them again.

Isaac Stern was at his most rewarding as he addressed himself to the Brahms' violin concerto. He was handsomely supported by the orchestra and there seemed to be a perfect mutuality between violinist and conductor. The Adagio, one of the most beautiful ever written, was played with superb depth and artistic feeling and it was never allowed to become cloying. Stern can toss off the most involved passages with ease and clarity.

Mr. Monteux concluded the program with an earthy, brilliant performance of Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan." The venerable conductor understood well the temperament of the ebullient "Don" and the performance had gaiety, dash and a bit of nostalgia.

Towering Heights

The recent death of Ernest Bloch caused changes in Saturday night's program for Mr. Munch chose to program Bloch's "Schelomo," a work for cello and orchestra. With Samuel Mayes as cellist, the performance was little short of magnificent. It had dignity, strength and reached towering heights. Mayes is a great artist and makes his cello sing like a human voice. Conductor and cellist were in complete accord and a fine balance was maintained.

Walter Piston's third symphony was appropriately placed on this program. Surely he is the most significant American symphony composer. The work has real melodic appeal, particularly the Adagio which is rich enough in content to be taken out of context and used as a concerto for orchestra. The composer was present to hear the performance and that always pleases a Tanglewood audience. The concert concluded with a well integrated performance of Brahms' second symphony. The first symphony was abandoned in favor of the second because of the length of the Bloch work.

Sunday afternoon was a gala concert because of the presence of Rudolf Serkin playing Brahms' first piano concerto. The whole performance was just as it should have been. Mr. Munch started things with a beautifully modulated performance of the "Variations On a Theme of Haydn." The clarity of this performance enabled us to marvel anew at the ingenuity and imagination of Brahms as a composer in this form.

Aaron Copland is always certain of having one or more of his works played during a Berkshire Festival. This time he was safely snuggled in between the "Variations" and the piano concerto. He had whipped up an orchestral suite from his opera "The Tender Land" and he directed the performance. As was to be expected it was a clever piece of writing and, to us, it was to be preferred to the opera. Incidentally, Copland is a much better orchestra conductor than are most of his colleagues whom we have heard.

Serkin and his instrumental colleagues under the direction of Mr. Munch reached a perfect accord during the performance of Brahms' first piano concerto. The lengthy introduction set the pace. Serkin was in rare form, much less nervous than he had seemed during rehearsal. His softest phrases were crystal clear, even far outside the music Shed and to the bravura passages he brought unsuspected strength. The performance always moved ahead, there was no lagging and at the conclusion the Shed rang with bravos which were truly deserved.

Students in Stride

The Student Orchestra has hit its stride and last Thursday night provided a delectable performance of Faure's "Melisande" under the direction of Charles Munch. It was a delicate, beautifully shaded performance, one of the best we have ever heard from a Student Orchestra. There was always a splendid performance of the first movement of the Beethoven "Concerto No. 5 in E flat major."

The pianist was Eugenia Hyman and the conductor was Thomas Griswold. Young Mr. Griswold is, we believe, a member of the music department of Williams College. He has learned a lot about conducting since we last heard him and the concerto was well served by pianist and conductor. Miss Hyman provided some fine touches and a penetrating interpretation.

A Look at the Arts

By E. J. D.

Our recent busman's holiday took us to Tanglewood and to the Stratford (Ontario) Shakespeare Festival. Concerning the attractions of the latter, we have reported at some length in a special story.

As for the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, which ended its 22d season on Aug. 3, the three programs we attended were most rewarding. Perhaps the highlight of the three concerts was Isaac Stern's brilliant work in Brahms' "Violin Concerto in D Minor," with Pierre Monteux conducting the Boston Symphony. Mr. Stern offered a reading that had fire, spirit, and genuine poetry.

EARL J. DIAS

Another highlight was Rudolf Serkin's performance on Brahms' "Piano Concerto No. 1," which, personally, we do not like so much as the same composer's second piano concerto. The first has always struck us as somewhat wild and woolly. However, its technical demands were skillfully met by Mr. Serkin, whose flair for Brahms is well known.

For us, a third highlight was the premiere performance of Aaron Copland's "Suite from 'The Tender Land,'" an excellent orchestration of some selections from the Copland opera of several seasons ago, with the composer conducting.

Tanglewood

During the weekend of July 24 to 26 we heard some fine music making in Tanglewood. But, poor Isaac Stern played in a humid, exhausting atmosphere on Friday night that caused him to retune his violin five or six times. Never have I seen him more exhausted. The Boston Symphony played like a jewel. Pierre Monteux—le grand maitre—gave a performance of precision and finesse. The following evening we heard Piston's Third Symphony, which was performed by the orchestra eleven years ago and awarded the Pulitzer Prize. Bloch's "Schelomo" was brilliantly performed in commemoration of the composer's passing. Samuel Mayes is a cellist of distinction. He gave a dynamic and youthful performance. Brahms' 2nd Symphony completed the program. . . Brahms' First Piano Concerto was played at the Sunday afternoon concert. It was given an exceptionally beautiful performance. Aaron Copland conducted his suite from "The Tender Land." The suite is a rainbow of incredibly rich colors. So is Tanglewood.—CLAUDE BLUMENEAU (Guest critic).

The following weekend was still humid and muggy. On Friday, July 31, Charles Munch conducted Berlioz' "Grand Messe des Morts" with the Festival Chorus and John McCollum, tenor. The performance, a sensitive and definitive one, was inspiring. The large chorus sang beautifully. On the following evening Monteux once again mounted the podium. But this time it was a laggard performance. Mendelssohn's 4th Symphony was without zest, and even Rudolf Serkin could not bring the 1st Piano Concerto by that same composer to life. A post-intermission conglomeration of Schumann and Wagner selections brought an uneven evening to an end. It was Isaac Stern who redeemed the weekend with his memorable performance, the next afternoon, of the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto. Munch gave vibrant support. Tcherepnin's Symphony No. 4 and Schumann's Symphony No. 2 completed the program.

The final weekend was dedicated to Beethoven. Aug. 7 the program included the Symphony No. 4, the Fantasy in C minor and Piano Concerto No. 4 with Serkin as soloist. Charles Munch conducted. Aug. 8 Monteux conducted the Fidelio overture, Symphonies Nos. 6 and 5 in vigorous fashion. Sunday afternoon was given over to the Choral Symphony (No. 9) under Munch's baton. Adele Addison, soprano, Florence Kopleff, contralto, Blake Stern, tenor, and Donald Gramm, baritone, and the Festival Chorus participated.

Rachel Hartley's Corner

A trip to the Berkshires to hear two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, included impressions of not only the music, but of the people in attendance, the kind of clothes they wore, the scenery and flowers along the way, and the kinds of cars among the endless hundreds parked in the lot.

The weather lent itself to the occasion with bright sunshine and fresh clear air. The view of wooded hills and distant panaramas was clear as crystal, any number suggesting a perfect picture. Fields were green — a circumstance not always true of August; and I was surprised to realize that there are also many colorful flowers in bloom this month — that spring and fall are not the only periods to expect bright leaves and blossoms.

Along miles of the roadside there were masses of dusty pink milkweed, azure blue chicory, delicate Queen Anne's lace, and brown-eyed susans; and beginning to show its color were the sprays of golden rod — always the forerunner of autumn. When the road ran through overhanging tree branches, the sun glinted through the leaves in sharp light and shadow; and three hours at the wheel following the white ribbon of the roads, brought us to Great Barrington where we were to spend the night.

The well-marked route to Tanglewood led into the huge parking area, and one has to take special note of landmarks in order to find the car later. And later, in the darkness, with hundreds of cars all trying to leave at the same time, endless headlights flashing, some foolish horns sounding, people milling around among the cars — one man had a knitted stole draped around his shoulders (it was cool), and a girl had a yellow blanket wrapped around her Indian-style and dragging in the dirt at her heels. Inch by inch the cars moved toward the exits, jockeying for place bumper to bumper, and after at last reaching the highway, still a mile or more of very close formation.

The concert was in the shed; the musicians all in white on the platform; the ceiling over it constructed of modern black and white acoustical material in triangles in which the lights shone, and little moths and fireflies twinkled in their gleam. The gleam caught, too, the tips of the rhythmically moving violin bows. The audience hummed like a big hive of bees, until it suddenly hushed as the conductor appeared.

Monteux conducted (I heard a man say, "Pretty good for age 82,") and it was better than 'pretty good', it was wonderful, especially for my favorite symphony Mendelsohn's 'Italian,' and Rudolph Serkin gave an animated performance of a piano concerto.

Sunday morning we went to a nearby state park and thought we would walk to the view of Bishbash falls, but the very steep rocky path looked too rugid, so we settled for a quiet drive, going back to Tanglewood soon after noon. The wide lawns were already well besprinkled with groups of people, many on blankets eating picnic lunches, a large percentage of them dressed in shorts. The view from the lawn toward a blue, blue lake with purple mountains beyond, was almost too much like a bright foreign lithograph.

It was an ideal warm, bright sunny day, and hundreds of listeners heard the concert from the lawn, as well as from seats in the shed. We came away refreshed, good music, beautiful scenery, lovely weather, and made the trip home as darkness fell. As we came from the garage, we heard a sound that has always been called prophetic —a cricket, and if the old saying is true, we shall have frost in six weeks.

Next Week at Tanglewood-

Festival Chorus Will Join In 'Requiem' Performance

Composers of the romantic period will be featured in the Tanglewood programs of the coming weekend on Friday and Saturday evenings, July 31 and Aug. 1 at 8:30, and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 2, at 2:30.

Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony in the Music Shed on Friday evening. His program will be devoted to the Requiem of Hector Berlioz, presented as a memorial to the late Serge Koussevitzky. The tenor soloist will be John McCollum, and the Festival Chorus, prepared by Hugh Ross and Lorna Cooke de Varon, will be joined by the University of Maryland Chapel Choir, Fague Springmann, conductor.

Saturday's Berkshire Festival Concert will be conducted by Pierre Monteux whose varied program will include Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony; Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto No. 1, with Rudolph Serkin as soloist; Schumann's "Manfred" Overture, and Schumann's introduction and Allegro appassionato for Piano and Orchestra (again with Mr. Serkin). Music for Everybody

Musical Perfectionists Become More Tolerant

BY SIGMUND SPAETH

From time to time there is an irresistible impulse to analyze the title of this column and ask frankly whether "Music for Everybody" is an actual possibility and just how literally it can be interpreted. The phrase has become quite common, appearing as the title of several books and as a slogan of the Music Educators National Conference. In spite of its wide use, there are still far too many people who apparently do not believe in it.

SPAETH

Of course "Music for Everybody" may be taken literally in the sense that it would be hard to find anyone completely unaffected by it in some way. But how far this generalization can be carried in the direction of honest enjoyment or "appreciation" of the art, particularly in its higher forms, or of understanding and even participation in its beauties is another question.

It has recently been brought home forcibly to this columnist in connection with the publication of his latest book, nostalgically called "Fifty Years with Music." The comments of both readers and reviewers have proved definitely enlightening and deserve serious attention of the part of one who sincerely desires to share at least the pleasure of hearing good music with as many "average listeners" as possible.

Critics Are Kind

Let it be stated unqualifiedly that the book has been most favorably received, and there are no complaints whatever so far as the author is concerned. Particularly in the newspapers carrying this column as a regular feature, the musical and literary critics have been exceedingly kind and generous. Actually no definite disapproval has been expressed anywhere.

One fairly common observation has been that "Fifty Years with Music" is "not for scholars." This must be considered a real compliment, for to have the book appeal to so limited an audience would be disastrous. Even more encouraging is the frequent use of words like "layman," "uninitiated," "novice" and phrases like "the common man" (whoever he may be). These are the readers that any writer on music would naturally like to reach, and frankly it is not an easy assignment.

Those who really know something about music are far too ready to take refuge in an array of technical terms, apparently unable to see the woods for the trees." This applies not only to serious musical scholars but to aficionados of jazz as well, strangely inarticulate group (except in actual demonstrations of their skill), who resort to a jargon just as incomprehensible as that of most concert program notes, which musicians themselves admit they do not understand.

Snobbery Decreases

At least, it is now clear that the number of musical reactionaries has definitely decreased and that there is far less hypocrisy and snobbery connected with all the arts than at any time in the past. Those who once insisted on putting great music on a pedestal, where ordinary human beings could not get at it, have now modified their stubborn perfectionism and become fairly tolerant of the modest music lover who would merely like to play or sing a little "for fun" and to listen for the sake of normal enjoyment. This type of enthusiast still represents more than 90 per cent of the potential supporters of good music and perhaps the same percentage of the readers of such a book as "Fifty Years with Music."

Folk Tune Thrills

The big Russian festival of music and dance recently presented at Madison Square Garden and now touring the United States in connection with the exhibit currently on display in New York's Coliseum offers many interesting features in addition to the general impressiveness of the performances. There is, for example, a special thrill in recognizing the original folk tune of "Down St. Peter's Road," used by Stravinsky in his ballet "Petroushka." The beautiful melody called "Meadowland" has also become familiar, chiefly through an arrangement by Morton Gould. Naturally a Russian "Old Folks at Home" always brings prolonged applause. Propaganda, politics and abusive threats are easily forgotten when people meet on the common level of great art.

CHARLES MUNCH, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the programs of Friday evening, 8:30 o'clock, and Sunday afternoon, 2:30 o'clock; and Pierre Monteux will conduct the Saturday evening concert. All of the programs will be presented in the music shed.

The Friday evening program will be devoted in its entirety to the "Requiem" of Hector Berlioz, which will be presented as a memorial to the late Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who was the orchestra's music director for 25 years and who founded the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. John McCollum will be the tenor soloist and the Festival Chorus, prepared by Hugh Ross and Lorna Cooke DeVaron, will be joined by the University of Maryland Chapel Choir, Fague Springmann, conductor. Additional brass players will join the regular orchestra to form the four brass choirs which are heard in the "Dies Irae," "Tuba Mirum" and "Lacrymosa" of the "Requiem."

MUSIC

Season Well Advanced In Musical Programs

By GORDON E. ARMSTRONG

Many of us invariably plan to include a number of concerts in our summer schedule of activities but frequently our good intentions somehow dissolve in a warm-weather lethargy and melt away like a morning haze at sunrise. Concerts need patrons but "wait for no man," to paraphrase the old saying. With regard to several musical series which hold particular interest for us, this week's programs serve as a reminder that ticket lines are growing "shorter," in number if not in length. Fortunately there's still time to gather a few "musical" tidbits" before the summer season ends; nobody likes to be a "wall-flower" at those fall reunions when friends recount the highlights of their concert-going!

Of course, we can't all attend the same concerts for one reason or another. But there's no need for us to envy friends who have attended far-away concerts or festival programs. The best in both symphonic and chamber music events is easily available to Connecticut music lovers at this time of year. Surely the Berkshire Music Festival compares with the best to be found anywhere and the several chamber music series, including our own Starlight Festival in New Haven, offer enjoyable listening for discriminating audiences. Should a traveled friend say, "The fifth (Beethoven) at Red Rocks was really something," you can come back with, "Munch set an exciting pace in the second (Brahms) at Tanglewood."

If this sounds something like horse-racing (like the "third" at Hialeah), it is somewhat apropos since my opening point is that the summer season is fast racing to a close in places like Tanglewood and Norfolk. The Norfolk Music School's series ends with the final concert on Wednesday while the Berkshire Festival has but two more weeks to go. And there will be but one more concert in our Starlight Festival after the third event on Tuesday evening in the Saybrook College Courtyard.

The young pianist-composer, Robert Helps, is to be the guest artist with the Starlight Festival players on Tuesday evening. This will mark his second appearance in the current series. He had a dual role in the opening program when he accompanied soprano Bethany Beardslee in her offerings which included two songs by the talented composer.

Helps, a graduate of Juilliard, has already become a recognized musician both as performer and composer. He has performed with major orchestras including an appearance with the San Francisco Symphony under Pierre Monteux and his compositions have been heard in concerts here and abroad. One work won him the 10th annual Naumberg Award and another, which received the Fromm Foundation Award, was later performed by the Symphony of the Air under Stokowski's baton.

On Tuesday evening, Helps will have a featured role in two works scheduled for performance — Schubert's Piano Trio in E flat (Op. 100) and Milhaud's Piano Quintet No. 1 Bocherini's Quartetto in C minor (Op. 1, No. 1) will complete the program.

In the event of inclement weather, the program will be held in the Saybrook Dining Hall as was the second event two weeks ago. Concert time is 8:30 p. m.

YALE FACULTY MEMBERS AT NORFOLK

Two Yale faculty members will have prominent roles in the final concert of the Norfolk Music School series, to be held in the Music Shed at Norfolk on Wednesday afternoon at 3:30. They are conducter Donald Leach and baritone Benjamin De Loache, who will appear with the chorus and orchestra of the school in an all-choral program.

Wednesday's concert will commemorate the 300th anniversary of the birth of Henry Purcell and the 200th anniversary of the death of Handel, both of which dates are being observed this year. Two anthems by the former and the Dettingen Te Deum by the latter composer are included in the program.

The contemporary offering is to be a Magnificat by John Crawford, a recent graduate of the Yale Music School who is presently a teaching fellow at Harvard.

CONNECTICUT VALLEY MUSIC FESTIVAL

ALFRED ZEGA

It was erroneously stated here last Sunday that the finalists in the competition of the Connecticut Valley Music Festival would appear in the second program of the festival's current series last week. The three young artists — pianist Walter Brennan, contralto Louise Anna Pawlow, and pianist Barbara Hudobenko will perform for the judges in the third program at the Valley Regional Auditorium in Deep River on Thursday evening of this week. This is the first time that an audience will be present for the finals in this competition.

Incidentally, baritone Alfred Zega, manager of the festival's concerts, may be seen at the Oakdale Musical Theater this week where he will sing the role of Dawgmeat in the popular musical, "Li'l Abner."

POPS AT FAIRFIELD UNIVERSITY FIELD

One of America's great song stylists, Eartha Kitt, is to be the guest artist in the second program of the Connecticut Symphony's Pops series on Friday evening at Fairfield University Field. The singer's personal coach and conductor, Maurice Levine, will conduct the concert. A feature story about Levine, the West Haven boy who made good on Broadway, will be found in the Magazine section of today's Sunday Register.

Miss Kitt is scheduled for two appearances in Friday's concert. In her first group she will present a varied selection of art songs, spirituals, and folk songs of several nationalities. Her second group includes a number of favorites from opera and musical comedies.

The orchestral portion of the program lists such delectable Pops fare as Gould's "American Salute," Copland's Hoe Down from "Rodeo," Anderson's "Waltzing Cat," and Robert Russell Bennett's symphonic picture of "Porgy and Bess." Tickets are on sale here at Cutler's.

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL

Charles Munch and Pierre Monteux will share conducting honors in the major concerts scheduled for this coming weekend at the Berkshire Music Festival. Dr. Munch will conduct the programs on Friday evening and Sunday afternoon.

Friday's concert will be devoted in its entirety to a presentation of the "Requiem" by Berlioz, to be given in memory of the Boston Symphony's former conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The Festival Chorus and the University of Maryland Chapel Choir will participate and the soloist is to be tenor John McCollum.

For Saturday evening's program Monteux has chosen the following program of romantic works: "Italian Symphony" and the Piano Concerto No. 1, by Mendelssohn; "Manfred" Overture and the Introduction and Allegro appassionato for Piano and Orchestra, by Schumann; Prelude and Love Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." Rudolph Serkin is to be the featured pianist of the occasion.

The highlight of next Sunday afternoon's concert will be the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto with Isaac Stern as soloist. Also listed are Schumann's Symphony No. 2 and the Symphony No. 4 by the contemporary composer, Alexander Tcherepnin. The latter work, composed in 1957, is dedicated to Dr. Munch.

JAZZ AT OAKDALE MUSICAL THEATER

The jazz series at the Oakdale Musical Theater continues this evening at 8 when three celebrated groups are scheduled to provide both vocal and instrumental delights for jazz fans. The groups are Dave Brubeck's Quartet, "Wild" Bill Davison's all-star Dixieland ensemble, and the accomplished songsters, the Hi-Lo's.

The Brubeck group and the Hi-Lo's are making their Oakdale debut in this evening's "one-night stand" though Davison and his boys will be returning in response to their previous successes in the Wallingford Tent.

Briefs The public is invited to a concert to be given by students and faculty members at the Neighborhood Music School on Friday evening at 8. The concert marks the end of the school's summer sessions . . . Baritone John Langstaff is to be the guest artist in this afternoon's Music Mountain concert by the Berkshire Quartet.

Violinist And Pianist At Lenox

(Special To The American)

LENOX, MASS.— The Berkshire Festival's week-end presented Isaac Stern, violinist, and Rudolf Serkin, pianist, before large audiences under the baton of Pierre Monteux and Charles Munch who led the orchestra in their accustomed finished performances.

Stern performed the Brahms "Violin Concerto" Friday night in such a brilliant opening movement that the ovation stopped the concerto for a few moments.

Serkin, playing Brahms' "Piano Concerto in D minor, No. 11" yesterday afternoon in a concert under ideal conditions before a large audience in the shed and on the lawns, scored another of the successes he has had at Tanglewood in the years he has been appearing here. Dr. Munch also conducted Brahms' "Variations on a Theme of Haydn" and Aaron Copland conducted his own "Suite from The Tender Land." Saturday night's concert with Munch conducting featured the music of Brahms and drew the usual large Saturday evening audience that makes its way here when the weatherman cooperates for ideal listening.

The programs for this third week of the Festival will have Munch conducting the Berlioz "Requiem" at the Koussevitzky Memorial Concert on Friday evening with John McCollum, tenor, soloist. Concerts Saturday and Sunday will present music of Schumann and Mendelssohn with a bit of Wagner and Tcherepnin. Serkin will be heard at the piano Saturday night in Schumann's "Manfred Overture and Concert Piece, Op. 92" with Monteux conducting. The rest of the program will include Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony and Piano Concerto No. 1" with Serkin as soloist and Wagner's "Prelude and Love Death from Tristan."

For Isaac Stern's return on Sunday afternoon the violinist will play the Mendelssohn "Violin Concerto." The program will include music of Tcherepnin and Schumann's "Symphony No. 2."

Music Review

Tanglewood Chamber Concert

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE FIFTH chamber music program of the Tanglewood Wednesday evening series was played in the theater-concert hall last night by Alexander Schneider, violinist, and Leon Kirchner, pianist, who is also a guest this year on the composition faculty of the Berkshire Music center.

The two artists framed Kirchner's Sonata Concertante for violin and piano, written in 1952, between two sonatas of Mozart, one in B flat, the other in E flat.

THE KIRCHNER sonata is a formidable piece, written in three movements but played without pause. It is really a concerto for each instrument and the performance, as such, was brilliant. The rhapsodic, improvisatory nature of the work leads into vertiginous leaps and cascades, and the technical hurdles seem fiendish on an initial hearing even though the performance was of dazzling virtuosity.

Kirchner gives the violin the introduction solo written in double stops which reappears later in the body of the work and is used again in the final coda. This is no music for a timid soul for the rash exploits require dash and derring-do, both of which attributes the artists possessed in superabundant quantities.

The impression is conveyed of tremendous avalanche-like thrusts stemming from irrepressible heroic and romantic compulsion. The harmonic structure obscures no revolutionary threats nor arcana yet the linear writing is extremely intricate and relentless. The impact of the performance, however, was so powerful that it was coherent even though it will require further acquaintance to make it transparent.

BOTH MOZART sonatas were large-scale works. The first, (K. 454) opens with an allegro which is entered through a "proud largo" which Alfred Einstein thought serves as "a triumphal arch." Kirchner and Schneider kept every phrase of their Mozart fresh and zestful. There was no suspicion of mere respectful veneration but rather a spirit of love and self-immersion. Mozart alternates the more dominant role in his sonatas continually, and each artist stepped into the limelight or withdrew to the shadows, as the music demanded, with not only true modesty, but with a sense of fitness.

Alexander Schneider

The second Mozart sonata (K. 481) has a long adagio of which the second subject is one of the most touching phrases in Mozart's whole literature. Its poignancy was compounded by the artists' manner of letting it flow without additional adornment by either instrument. The whole sonata abounded in subtle and authoritative refinement.

* * *

THIS WAS an evening of music making for the sake of the music, not for the glory of the performers. Neither of the artists apparently considered that day lost when a phrase was allowed to remain only in support of a more obviously important one. And if anyone still considers Mozart quaint, in the sense of tourists visiting backward and undeveloped countries, he might well have listened to what Kirchner and Schneider saw and hence expressed of the sonatas they chose last night. Their palette ran from robust virility to the most gentle grace, always seasoned with the most delightful taste. A lovely evening.

Music Review

Tanglewood Chamber Concert

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE FIFTH chamber music program of the Tanglewood Wednesday evening [illegible] played in the theater-concert hall last night by Alexander Schneider, violinist, and Leon Kirchner, pianist, who is also a guest this year on the composition faculty of the Berkshire Music center.

The two artists framed Kirchner's Sonata Concertante for violin and piano, written in 1952, between two sonatas of Mozart, one in B flat, the other in E flat.

THE KIRCHNER sonata is a formidable piece, written in three movements but played without pause. It is really a concerto for each instrument and the performance, as such, was brilliant. The rhapsodic, improvisatory nature of the work leads into vertiginous leaps and cascades, and the technical hurdles seem fiendish on an initial hearing even though the performance was of dazzling virtuosity.

Kirchner gives the violin the introduction solo written in double stops which reappears later in the body of the work and is used again in the final coda. This is no music for a timid soul for the rash exploits require dash and derring-do, both of which attributes the artists possessed in superabundant quantities.

The impression is conveyed of tremendous avalanche-like thrusts stemming from irrepressible heroic and romantic compulsion. The harmonic structure obscures no revolutionary threats nor arcana yet the linear writing is extremely intricate and relentless. The impact of the performance, however, was so powerful that it was coherent even though it will require further acquaintance to make it transparent.

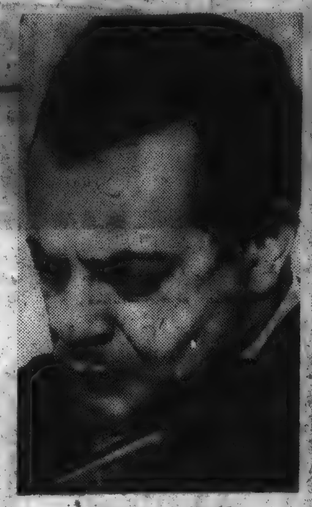
BOTH MOZART sonatas were large-scale works. The first, (K. 454) opens with an allegro which is entered through a "grand largo" which Alfred Einstein thought serves as "a triumphal arch." Kirchner and Schneider kept every phrase of their Mozart fresh and zestful. There was no suspicion of mere respectful veneration but rather a spirit of love and self-immersion. Mozart alternates the more dominant role in his sonatas continually, and each artist stepped into the limelight or withdrew to the shadows, as the music demanded, with not only true modesty, but with a sense of fitness.



Alexander Schneider

The second Mozart sonata (K. 481) has a long adagio of which the second subject is one of the most touching phrases in Mozart's whole literature. Its poignancy was compounded by the artists' manner of letting it flow without additional adornment by either instrument. The whole sonata abounded in subtle and authoritative refinement.

* * *

THIS WAS an evening of music making for the sake of the music, not for the glory of the performers. Neither of the artists apparently considered that day lost when a phrase was allowed to remain only in support of a more obviously important one. And if anyone still considers Mozart quaint, in the sense of tourists visiting backward and undeveloped countries, he might well have listened to what Kirchner and Schneider saw and hence expressed of the sonatas they chose last night. Their palette ran from robust virility to the most gentle grace, always seasoned with the most delightful taste. A lovely evening.

"It's Entertainment"

THEATER — FILMS — RADIO — TV — MUSIC

"The Pajama Game", the rollicking musical which gave such songs as "Hey There" to the Hit Parade, brings Martha Wright back to the Oakdale Theatre for one week beginning Monday. The carrot-topped, blue-eyed beauty, who sold the Oakdale tent out for every performance when she appeared in "South Pacific" has been too busy with her radio chores to make many personal appearances but she is doing some limited summer stock.

Co-starring with Miss Wright will be Don Cornell, one of the country's hottest recording stars. Tim Herbert, an emerging young comedian who has appeared at the Wallingford summer theatre before, will support the two stars. The musical was a hit from its first performance in New Haven. It racked up 1,601 showing on Broadway, making it the tenth longest running musical in theatrical history. Only two current shows, "The Threepenny Opera" and "My Fair Lady" are ahead of it in the long run sweepstakes.

Composers of the Romantic Period will be featured in the Tanglewood programs this weekend. Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony in the Music Shed tomorrow evening. His program will be devoted in its entirety to the Requiem of Hector Berlioz, which will be presented as a memorial to the late Dr. Serge Koussevitsky who founded the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

* * * *

Saturday's program will be conducted by Pierre Monteux, whose varied program will include Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony No. 4 and his Piano Concerto No. 1 in G Minor with Rudolph Serkin as soloist. Also to be heard will be Schuman's "Manfred" Overture and the same composer's Introduction and Allegro appassionato for Piano and Orchestra, again with Mr. Serkin.

* * * *

On Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood Mr. Munch will be the conductor and violinist Isaac Stern will be the guest soloist in the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto in E minor. The program will open with the Fourth Symphony by Alexander Tcherepnin and will close with Schuman's Symphony No. 2 in C major.

* * * *

In addition to our own Oakdale, other summer theatre bills in the area spotlight "Loves Rides the Rails" starting Tuesday at Branford's Montowese Playhouse, "Biography" with Faye Emerson starting Monday at Ivoryton and "The Glass Menagerie" with Eli Wallach starting Monday at the Westport Country Playhouse.

* * * *

After a rather slow start the summer theatre business is coming back in fine shape, according to this past week's Variety, the theatrical weekly. Oakdale set a box office record with a $43,000 gross for Anna Marie Alberghetti in "Rose Marie". The same week Stratford's Shakespeare Theatre did almost $40,000 and the small Westport Country Playhouse took in over $17,000 for "Caesar and Cleopatra".

Schneider, Kirchner Join In Sonata Music at Lenox

By D. E. RITZ
Gazette Music Editor

Alexander Schneider, violinist; and Leon Kirchner, pianist and composer, presented a sonata program Wednesday evening at the Theatre-Concert Hall at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., in the series given annually as a benefit for the Tanglewood revolving scholarship fund of the Berkshire Music Center.

THE PROGRAM FEATURED Kirchner's own "Sonata Concertante for Piano and Violin" written in 1952. Also presented were two Mozart sonatas—the one in "B flat, K. 454," composed in 1784; and the one in "E flat major, K. 481) written in 1785.

Kirchner, serving this summer as an assistant to Aaron Copland in the composition department of the Berkshire Music Center, served as lecturer in the music department of the University of California (1947-48) and will begin a seminar at the University of Buffalo this autumn.

Born in Brooklyn in 1919, he has studied with Albert Elkus and Edward Strickland at the University of California in Berkeley and also had lessons with Ernest Bloch. He studied composition with Roger Sessions in New York in 1942. He received the New York Critics Circle Award in 1950 and the League of Composers (Rodgers and Hammerstein) commission for an orchestral work in 1950.

"THE SONATA Concertante" has been described by Alexander L. Ringer in the Musical Quarterly of January, 1957, as "representing a crystallized style all his (Kirchner's) own."

With no special aptitude for music of the modern idiom, we listened intently. We found the work serious and workmanlike, with a fine understanding of the techniques of both instruments. It was presented with equally fine artistry by the two performers and we particularly admired the effort which Schneider had expended in mastering the difficulties of the violin part. There was even one part we liked—an intermovement episode with solo muted violin against a dramatic concluding chord of the previous movement held by the piano. The episode was too brief and was immediately followed by more "instruments in turmoil" playing.

The work was given an enthusiastic reception by the audience.

THE TWO MOZART sonatas formed the musical portion of the evening with melodies such as only a Mozart could write.

The slow movements had particular beauty, and the lovely violin music and the singing tone of Schneider's violin were most enjoyable. Delightful sonata playing of the intimate type planned by the composer was given both sonatas by both Kirchner and Schneider.

The final program of the Wednesday evening series will be given next week by the Kroll string quartet featuring quartets by Beethoven, Hindemith and Brahms. Members of the Kroll quartet are William Kroll and Louis Graeler, violins; David Mankovitz, viola, and Avron Twerdowsky, 'cello.

BERLIOZ WORK IS TRIBUTE FOR KOUSSEVITZKY

Charles Munch Conducts 'Requiem' Performance At Tanglewood

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX—I cannot conceive a more beautiful musical tribute to the late Serge Koussevitzky, founder and director of the Berkshire Music Festival and long-time conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, than the finely proportioned, sensitive performance of the Berlioz' "Requiem" conducted by Charles Munch.

Uses Festival Chorus

Using the festival chorus, augmented by the University of Maryland Chapel Choir and the usual augmented brasses, the performance had a splendid solidity and sensitivity hardly imaginable with such large vocal and instrumental resources. We are told the chorus numbers about 170 voices. What was especially impressive was the clear articulation of the chorus, the instant response to cues and the careful intonation. Whether singing alone or accompanied the voices retained a freshness and easy flow of tone which made for fine listening.

Mr. Munch provided, for the most part, a lyrical approach to the work, thus the contrasts when all resources were used was, to put it mildly, overwhelming.

The power of the additional brass choirs is used only in the dies irae, tuba mirum and lacrymosa. Elsewhere the music has a kind of ethereal sweetness and Mr. Munch was fortunate in having so able a tenor section and some excellent top sopranos.

The day of judgment was to Berlioz a spectacle, a heterogeneous assemblage of the blessed and the damned. Berlioz once wrote when contemplating an oratorio on this subject that the brass should be saved for the end. "But give me contrasts—religious choruses mixed with dancing carols." All this we find in the music of the "Requiem."

McCollum Tenor

John McCollum, tenor, the only soloist, sang the "Sanctus" in a poised and confident manner, with only a trace of labored top notes. The choral responses were beautifully articulated and the hosanna, a choral fuge, was sung with admirable clarity.

All participants in this performance were admirable and Hugh Ross who trained the chorus, merits particular mention. It was one of the finest festival choruses of many years.

Saturday night, Piere Monteux returns to the podium with Rudolf Serkin as soloist in Mendelssohn's "Concerto No 1 in G Minor." Mr. Serkin will also be heard in a concert piece for piano and orchestra by Schumann.

The program will open with Mendelssohn's "Italian symphony" and will include Schumann's "Overture to Byron's 'Manfred" and Wagner's prelude and liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde."

Berkshire Week in Review

Boom in Resort Trade

MUTTERINGS OF THUNDER just before the Koussevitzky Memorial Concert last night held the Tanglewood crowd to a modest 7,400, but barring a weekend cloudburst, attendance at the Berkshire Festival and other activities throughout the county was expected to hit a new high for the summer today and tomorrow. The Berkshire Hills Conference this morning reported "excellent" business, with most listed resorts and motels chock-full.

It remains a very shapes up as expected this weekend, it will be [illegible] of the unprecedented [illegible] business this year. So far the Berkshire tourist trade has soared 15 to 20 per cent over last year's record high.

Indications of the 1959 summer season are the experiences of resort owners and innkeepers last weekend. Such strategically located hostelries as the Curtis Hotel, the Wendell-Sherwood Hotel, Eastover, Festival House, Music Inn and Avaloch reported overflow crowds; and restaurants throughout the area did a brisk business.

Contributing heavily to the success of the season so far has been a cooperative stretch of weather, with few rainstorms and temperatures in the 80s and 90s. The unusually sunny midsummer skies have been in marked contrast with the climate at Massachusetts' other big resort region, Cape Cod, where until a few days ago rains had put a severe crimp in the tourist trade.

Glowing as were all the routine reports, there was one development that longtime observers of the county's resort activity found most heartening of all: This year many more innkeepers were receiving advanced bookings for the post-Tanglewood season. If the customary mid-August dropoff could be eliminated, and a few more visitors attracted in early summer, Berkshire bonifaces would have it made.

Tanglewood Tonight

4 Brass Bands Added to BSO For Berlioz' 'Requiem' in Shed

TANGLEWOOD—The most ambitious work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the 1959 Berkshire Festival will be presented tonight at 8:30 in the Music Shed when Dr. Charles Munch will conduct Berlioz' "Requiem" in its entirety.

Dr. Munch will direct the full 105-piece orchestra, plus 26 additional musicians who are being brought here to form four brass bands, the full Festival chorus of 200 voices, prepared by Hugh Ross and Lorna Cooke DeVaron, and the University of Maryland Chapel Choir, Fague Springman, conductor. John McCollum, a frequent Tanglewood soloist, will be the tenor soloist in tonight's program.

The four brass choirs will be heard from four sections in the huge shed in the "Dies Irae," "Tuba Mirum," and "Lacrymosa," of the great Requiem Mass.

The BSO concluded its Symphony Hall season in April with the Berlioz "Requiem" performance when a 150-voice chorus from the New England Conservatory of Music appeared with the orchestra. At the Boston performance, Dr. Munch placed the four brass choirs in the second balconies of the auditorium. The work was later recorded by RCA-Victor, taking two days to complete the task, before Dr. Munch left for France to spend his pre-Tanglewood vacation. The recording is expected to be available in the fall.

Because of the many features at this weekend's concerts at Tanglewood, attendance is expected to pass the first two major concert weekends when about 27,500 turned out for each series.

Monteux and Serkin

Pierre Monteux will return to the podium tomorrow night at 8:30 with Rudolf Serkin as piano soloist and Sunday afternoon Dr. Munch will conduct the BSO with Isaac Stern as violin soloist.

Tomorrow night, Mr. Monteux will present a varied program, including Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony No. 4 in A major, Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto No. 1 in G minor with Mr. Serkin as soloist, Schumann's "Manfred" Overture and the same composer's Introduction and Allegro appassionata to for piano and orchestra, again with Mr. Serkin as soloist. The program will close with the Prelude and Love Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

Sunday afternoon Dr. Munch will open the program at 2:30 with Alexander Tcherepnin's Fourth Symphony, which was composed in 1957 and dedicated to the BSO conductor. This will be followed by Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E minor, with Isaac Stern soloist. The program will close with Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C major.

Sunday in the Chamber Music Hall at 10, BMC Chamber Music (Friends) and at 2.30 in the Shed, Boston Symphony under Charles Munch will play Tcherepnin and Schumann, with Isaac Stern playing Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. Wednesday at 8.30, in the Theater, Beethoven, Hindemith and Brahms chamber music by the Kroll Quartet. Thursday at 8.30 in the Shed, Arthur Fiedler will conduct the Boston Pops in a Gershwin program.

Fine Eating Places

A reservation generally is necessary to be sure of being seated at the following top-rated eating places. There are many other offering equally excellent cuisine and service, but here are a few:

The Log Cabin, Route 141, Holyoke; Alwin and Olga, Federal St., Greenfield; the Lord Jeffrey, center of Amherst; Egremont Tavern, South Egremont; Sun-Inside, Route 23, Monterey; Wiggins Old Tavern, King St., Northampton, Yankee Pedlar, Junction of Routes 5 and 202, Holyoke, and the Student Prince, Fort St., Springfield.

Turning from the sitting forms to more active recreation, naturalists and just plain tourists are likely to enjoy a trip through the marble gorge in North Adams. This rock formation is laced with walks and bridges which enable the visitor to view the strata which was formed during the Cambrian and Ardovician periods of the Paleozoic era, when there was no plant or animal life above the sea.

Saturday from 1 to 6 p. m. the Shaker Museum, Old Chatham, N. Y., will hold its fourth annual festival. There will be Shaker dancing and singing and exhibits of antiques, blacksmithing, woodworking, spinning and weaving.

Fishermen without tackle or license may still catch trout at the Berkshire Trout Farm on Route 41, Sheffield, where the management provides everything you need, except luck.

Campsites in Berkshires

Campsites open to the public are located at Pittsfield State Forest, on Berry Pond, Pittsfield; Savoy Mountain and Mohawk Trail State Forests, Route 2, east of North Adams; October Mountain State Forest, east of Lenox Dale, (the only Berkshire area offering state-owned tents and trailer sites), and Beartown Mountain camping area, reached by following signs posted in Great Barrington, Stockbridge, Tyringham and Monterey.

To end a busy week with a quiet Sunday, in good weather oil paintings may be seen at Art by the Roadside, 1½ miles north of Lanesboro on Route 7. The Berkshire Museum, in the center of Pittsfield, is currently featuring the New England Sculptors Association exhibit; paintings by Harry Lane; Little International Show, and the photography of Otto Litzel.

Music: Berlioz Requiem

Munch Conducts Work at Tanglewood Fete

By HOWARD TAUBMAN
Special to The New York Times.

LENOX, Mass., July 31—Charles Munch conducts the Requiem by Berlioz as if it were one of the towering masterpieces of all art, and he comes close to persuading one that his affections are well founded.

The performance that he directed at Tanglewood tonight was filled with reverence and passion. In its cohesion, in its control of huge forces and in its intensity, this interpretation stated Berlioz' case with overwhelming authority. In the sweep of the occasion, one's reservations about the music were brushed aside.

Berlioz' imagination was always seized by grand, dramatic subjects, and surely no theme is mightier than the Last Judgment. If any composer was destined to grapple with it, Berlioz was the man. He himself was perhaps fonder of this work than any other he wrote, and it is a formidable achievement.

Berlioz does not scale the sublime heights that Mozart and Verdi reached in their settings of the Requiem. There are places where the impact of the enormous instrumental and choral apparatus depends more on size than inspiration; there are phrases that are commonplace. But there is also a throbbing, heartfelt sincerity in this work.

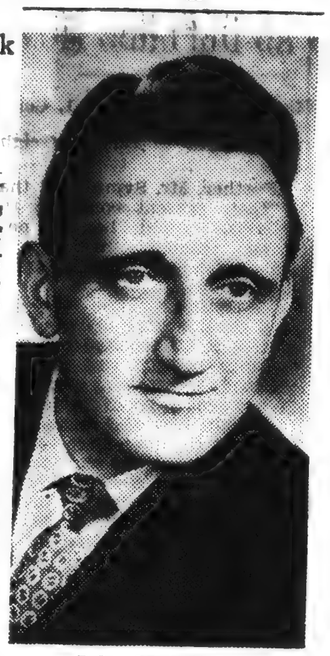
In our day, which, at least in music, has opted largely for spareness and neatness, Berlioz's invoking of hundreds of performers, including four brass choirs to augment the orchestra, seems both grandiloquent and naïve. But it would be erroneous to condescend to the men who dared to create in a tremendous frame. Berlioz was one who could fill it affectingly more often than not.

Mr. Munch is the interpreter par excellence of Berlioz. His conception of the "Symphonie Fantastique" when he first came to this country stamped him as a musician with a special affinity for the Frenchman. His handling of the Requiem, performed here some years ago, reinforced this view. And tonight's reading was even more impressive.

Mr. Munch has a tendency to let himself go at times, to speed up or slow down in ways that can be disturbing. But tonight he was in full command of himself and the score. He established its architecture with masterly precision, and he found the opportunity for all manner of felicities of phrasing and shading.



John McCollum

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played with freshness and spirit. Despite the humidity, the tone had a glorious richness; the strings deserved special commendation for accuracy and color. The additional brass choirs played with stirring sonority.

The Festival Chorus merits a tribute all its own. Composed of men and women who are working in the Berkshire Music Center and enlarged for this performance by the University of Maryland Chapel Choir, Fague Springmann conductor, it was splendidly trained in a short time by Hugh Ross and Lorna Cooke de Varon. It did its share with thrilling effectiveness.

John McCollum was the tenor soloist, and he sang with smoothness and amplitude. The tenor's only chance is in the Sanctus, and what he has to sing is as flattering to the voice as an operatic aria.

And why not? For Berlioz, as for Verdi, the Requiem was a profoundly dramatic subject. His music is charged with drama. Mr. Munch, who appreciates its magnitude, conveyed it with unforgettable fervor and tenderness.

Many Elements Of Greatness In Concert At Tanglewood

Last night's concert in the music shed at Tanglewood brought this year's most ambitious undertaking, namely Berlioz' Requiem. In spite of hot and humid weather and threats of rain a large audience measured at an even 7,400 was turned out.

Blending the tremendous performing forces required for this massive work into a cohesive and meaningful whole requires a master-conductor. Such a conductor we had last night in Charles Munch. But, while his performance was a brilliant technical feat, there was an earth bound quality to most of last night's performance. Munch's achievement was gigantic, but not Olympian. There was a certain detachment, and at times the pacing seemed tentative. He gave us much of himself, but it is not quite as unreasonable as wanting blood in a bull ring to want more in a work such as this. The performance was often beautiful an frequently exciting; it was rarely inspiring.

The high point of the performance was the Sanctus, with tenor John McCollum on hand for the only section requiring a vocal soloist. The Sanctus has pages which contain some of Berlioz' very best writing, with the tenor singing like a precentor and the chorus repeating his lines after him, all over a subdued orchestra. Let it be said that Mr. McCollum was glorious last night. This music is fiendishly difficult to sing, and is written very high for a male voice; undaunted, he evidenced no strain as he floated his tones out over the large audience. Even his highest notes had a fine, virile ring. And for all its heroic quality his singing was expressive and tender, with every word emerging clearly. Last night one was tempted to think that no one has ever sung this music better.

The chorus, too, sang magnificiently. They had body, cohesiveness, and nearly perfect enunciation. The Festival Chorus was prepared by Hugh Ross and Lorna Cooke de Varon and was augmented by Fague Springmann's University of Maryland Chapel Choir. There were times when the chorus was drowned out by the four brass bands—but then, who has ever heard a sound more noble and exciting than a huge chorus, singing at top volume, being drowned out by four brass bands?

The bands themselves gave us some wonderful moments—their tone was massive, but always clear and without blasting. The Dies Irae seems like a real Day of Wrath with sounds such as these!

The regular men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were in top form, which as all its fans know means very fine playing indeed. Chalk this up as a performance with many elements of greatness, others of near greatness.—M.d.B. B.—L. C. E.

7,400 Hear Requiem At Berkshire

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass.—Berlioz's magnificent Requiem was the attraction at the Berkshire Music Festival Friday evening, drawing more than 7,400 persons to hear the performance by Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the festival Chorus.

The lowering skies and threats of imminent storm that hung over the hills all day failed to discourage the festival patrons, and indeed by nightfall had grown into a kind of emotional setting for the Requiem. For although the music would triumph over almost any setting, however incongruous, it is even better heard in the mists than the moonlight.

Impact By Weight

It turned out to be a performance more distinguished for its impact by way of weight and volume of sound, than for musicality or technical poise. Certainly Berlioz conceived the Requiem as a great canvas, on which numbers of singers and numbers of instrumentalists and much high decibel value should convey both the sense of sorrow and of reverence overwhelmingly. Nor is there any doubt but that Mr. Munch conveyed much of the showiness of the composition in a rafter-rattling fashion. Those who like to be buffeted in a sea of sound swam for their lives. Insofar as sheer force is moving and exciting, the reading and the performance aroused the audience on this occasion.

Still, vehemence of sound and sentiment should not preclude musiciality to the degree it did Friday night, nor should it necessarily end up in so much pulling and hauling among the performers. Hugh Ross and Lorna De Varon had prepared the chorus of some 10 members, and they have enviable records in the choral field. Nevertheless, the singing was quit raw in tone, deficient in musical grace and polish, and not very expressive either in music or spirituality. Too often the drive for the big effect pulled the singers from poise and eloquence.

At the same time, the extraordinary variety of musical means and expression in the Berlioz Requiem is in great part its most compelling feature. The lyricism is as previous as the high drama. While the chorus sang with more security and finish in the quieter, more poetic sections of this Mass, the detailing was not much richer, nor the emotion more communicative than their work in the more brilliant areas.

Chorus Overrides

In short, the choral performance generally gave the impression of being somewhat beyond the secure and rich attainment of the singers. In addition, there were too many times when the chorus overrode the orchestra performance. The orchestra itself supplied the really moving music of the evening. The additional brass choir was not entirely together in its entrances of the tempi, but one is so accustomed to some fumbling here in all performances of the Requiem, that this may be overlooked by custom. It was a pleasure whenever the orchestra had the opportunity to take over from the singers.

Then an element of loveliness entered by way of sound and a seizing eloquence by way of expressiveness. It is indeed nice that young singers can have the opportunity to take part in this Berlioz masterpiece but it does not always work out to the best interests of the music. A movement to recapture the grandeur and fervor of the Requiem with a smaller chorus, where sheer numbers do not almost inevitably prophesy confusion, would be welcome.

Also welcome at the Berkshire Music Festival would be audiences that don't burst into applause any time the music stops. It is driving Mr. Munch to the verge of apoplexy.

Music: Epic Performance Of Berlioz' Requiem

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The third weekend of Music Shed concerts at Tanglewood got off to an epic start last night with a sensational performance of Berlioz' Requiem by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and festival chorus conducted by Charles Munch, with John McCollum as tenor soloist.

It was a memorial to the late Serge Koussevitzky, who was the orchestra's music director for 25 years and founded the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

The chorus of about 200 mixed voices was prepared by Hugh Ross and Lorna Cooke Devaron. Included was the University of Maryland Chapel Choir, Fague Springmann, conductor.

Twenty additional brass players joined the regular orchestra to form two brass choirs for the "Tuba Mirum" and "Lacrymosa." While these are customarily stationed in the rear of the auditorium for this performance they performed from the extreme sides of the huge stage.

Mass For the Dead

The requiem, which Berlioz called Messe des Morts, or Mass for the Dead, is one of his most monumental works. You might call it apocalyptic. He composed it in memory of soldiers who had perished in the service of France. It was first performed in 1837. It did not then sate Berlioz' ravenous appetite for immensity of sound, a legion orchestra and chorus—and a deafening climax in the "Tuba Mirum," thunderous fresco of the Last Judgement. Even last night's voluminous version probably wouldn't have satisfied him.

It thereby becomes one of the biggest musical shows on earth. The quality of its musical inspiration may be open to question. Disregarding that possiblity, last night's performance was a moving, profound, and reverent creation of art.

Nowhere was it touched with megalomania. Equal engrossment prevailed in those passages of the opening "Kyrie" as in the shattering blare of the "Lacrymosa."

The fullest exposure of expert choral training, prior to the performance, was in the unaccompanied "Quarens Me." Tones were richly hued and beautifully proportioned, especially in sopranos and basses. The complicated counterpoint was controlled with fine government.

Munch Not Happy

Munch was not particularly happy with his audience of 7,400.

The applause after the "Kyrie" was the first to disturb him. He held out his arms to prevent it, which did no good, so he just shook his head in resignation. He was less tolerant with the outburst that followed the "Tuba Mirum." It was just a smattering this time, but he quickly discouraged it by hastily beginning the "Quid Sum Miser" even before the male chorus had time to rise.

Munch's approach to the score was obviously devotional. One sensed that his role was that of participancy as well as director. It requires the clearest thought and total shunning of melodramatics to protect the work's stature as worship, however stentorean or clangorous.

One might have detected a trace of intentional showmanship when he cued the auxiliary brass choirs. But his was a remarkable demonstration of control over the complexities involving manifold instrumental and choral lines.

Slendid Soloist

While a trifle operatic in approach, McCollum was still a splendid solist for the "Sanctus." His lyric and well-groomed tenor voice had undertones of piety and his contribution added a great deal to the marvelous success of the entire performance.

Devoted mainly to music of the Romantic composers, the festival continues tonight with Pierre Monteux conducting the Boston Symphony. The orchestral portion of the program will be Mendelssohn's Fourth or "Italian" Symphony, Schumann's Overture to Byron's "Manfred," and the prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

Rudolph Serkin will be piano soloist in Mendelssohn's Concerto No. 1 in G Minor, and Schumann's introduction and allegro appassionato, concert piece for piano and orchestra, Opus 92.

The program will include the Beethoven Quartet No. 3; Hindemith's Quartet Op. 22 and the Quartet No. 2 by Brahms.

A delightful innovation will mark activities at the North Shore Music theater when a young people's concert, "The Art and Fun of Orchestration" unfolds next Thursday afternoon at 1:30. In charge will be Robert Mandell, music director at the theater. He was assistant to Leonard Bernstein in the notable young people's concerts of the New York Philharmonic on TV's Omnibus.

Serkin, Monteux Attract 12,441 Persons to Festival

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX—The magic of Rudolf Serkin's pianism and the universal popularity of Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony drew 12,441 persons to Tanglewood Saturday night, the largest crowd yet to be present this season.

Loved by Audience

They were treated to a program so full of lilting rhythms and gay melodies that, for awhile, it seemed as if one were transported to a bygone era, when people thought of music in terms of melodies and artists in terms of bravura. So, there was plenty of both Saturday night and the audience loved it.

Things started off gaily with a lilting, vivacious performance of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony. The young composer's impressions of a trip to Italy were as vivid musically as any written word and much more interesting than some travel impressions we have read.

Mr. Serkin came out to play, with orchestra, Mendelssohn's "Concerto No. 1, in G Minor." It also was as gay and full of brio. The performance was on the sweet side, with Mr. Serkin doing a deal of arm raising after each passage, but rippling through the work with amazing facility and a sort of charm one seldom encounters these days. It was all very elegant and the performance earned all concerned a round of bravos.

Allows Wide Range

Of Mr. Serkin's performance of Schumann's Introduction and Allegro Appassionato, a concert piece for piano and orchestra, we shall have to rely on what we heard at the Saturday morning rehearsal. This is a work of considerable interest, relatively short, yet allowing the pianist a wide range of imagination and plenty of opportunity to show off.

However, there s a thoughtful and passionate line running through the work which is very beautiful. Again, Mr. Serkin provided pianism of rare quality and the orchestra a collaboration finely balanced and rewarding.

It is quite possible that Byron's "Manfred" was never understood fully by the several composers who undertook to musicalize it, for none had enough English to interpret the lines. However, its brooding pessimism; its spirit of contemplation as well as the extravagance of its fervor all could comprehend and to Schumann this restless, wandering hero became an affinity as soon as he read of him. Thus, in its musical form, this overture is a powerful painting, both tragic and pathetic.

Orchestra Superb

The orchestra gave a superb account of the work, whose passionate utterance took one far from the elegant delights of a Mendelssohn soiree.

The program closed with a magnificant performance of the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde."

As we write, the faint sounds of some of the most beautiful music ever penned can be heard. Soon it will die away into nothingness and another memorable concert of the Tanglewood season will have ended.

Sunday afternoon Charles Munch will conduct the orchestra and Isaac Stern will be the soloist, playing Mendelssohn's "Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in E Minor." The concert will open with "Symphony No. 4 in E" By Tcherepnin and close with Schumann's Second Symphony.

Berlioz' Requiem Conducted By Munch at Tanglewood

By Jules Wolffers

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 1.—The mere mention of Berlioz' Grande Messe des Morts, Opus 5, brings to mind power, volume, size and immense proportions. But it was not these qualities that impressed one after hearing Charles Munch conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Festival Chorus last evening to open the fifth week of the Berkshire Festival in the Tanglewood shed. Rather it was the grace and economy of the conductor's interpretation of the Requiem that made the performance an unforgettable experience.

Although the composer made provision in his directions for the possibility of huge performing forces, the work is heard at its best with a minimum rather than a maximum number of players and singers. Mr. Munch used his regular orchestra, augmenting only the brass for the four choirs, which he placed two to a side on the extremes of the front stage right and left. The Festival Chorus was augmented by the University of Maryland Chapel Choir but even so, numbered less than half of the 400 singers Berlioz suggested as sufficient.

Yet there was all the volume one could possibly desire for the "Tuba mirum" and "Rex tremendae." The flexibility gained by smaller numbers more than made up any possible loss of volume except, of course, for those who expect this music to beat them into a stupor of submission.

All factors considered, Mr. Munch exercised remarkable control and coherence. Once or twice, chorus and orchestra lost touch with each other and the choral tone was occasionally raw, particularly in the earlier part of the work. But once the need for shouting was past, the chorus sang with excellent timbre to bring recognition to those who had trained them—Hugh Ross and Lorna Cooke de Varon at Tanglewood, and Fague Springmann, director of the University of Maryland contingent.

One regretted that the conductor found it necessary to include an intermission after the "Lacrymosa." The quietness of the final four sections makes a beautiful contrast to the awesome opening part, and in any event it is questionable to split up such a well-organized structure.

The high point of the performance came in the "Hostias" where John McCollum sang the tenor solo with amplitude, passion, feeling and high artistry for splendid results. Here the chorus surpassed itself in the responses and the instrumental accompaniment was a model of support and balance.

The concert formed an eminently suitable and appropriate memorial for Serge Koussevitzky to whose memory the performance was dedicated.

There were repeated platform calls at the end and hundreds in the audience stayed long after the stage was dark to discuss and gloat over the results of this splendid and notable performance.

Berlioz Requiem at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE "REQUIEM" of Hector Berlioz was the fare last night in the great Shed at Tanglewood for the first program of the fifth weekend of the Berkshire Festival. Charles Munch led the Boston Symphony Orchestra, augmented, as Berlioz asked, by an additional score or more of brass players, and the Festival chorus augmented by the University of Maryland Chapel choir, Fague Springman, conductor.

Because of Berlioz' demands for vast numbers of performers, one is likely to think of the "Grande Messe des Morts" as a Hollywoodish conception, a colossal or flamboyant exhibition. As a matter of fact, except for the three sections where the extra brass instruments are indicated, the "Requiem" is essentially a work whose magnitude, not only in numbers, but in structure, is realized by simplicity and basic economy.

IT IS a remarkable fact that so many composers, when about to embark on their magnum opus, a work which they approached with the greatest awe, reverted to a classic primitiveness. Wagner in the overture to "Parsifal," Beethoven in the principal theme of the Finale (choral) of his ninth symphony, and here Berlioz in this "Requiem," all make a monodic declaration. This single-voiced statement equals in impact the ponderous and stupendous effects the massed instruments and voices later produce.

Berlioz introduces the initial Introit with an ascending quiet scale played in unison by only the violas and second violins. The whole work, although the means may be compounded, never steps beyond a crystal clarity revealing the greatness of harmonic severity and open ingenuousness. He achieves a similar effect later in the Offertorium, when he gives the opening statement to the first violins alone.

It is not until the "Dies irae" that the four added brass choirs are heard. They were distributed last night to the four corners of the newly expanded stage of the Shed. At a previous performance, they had been placed in the corners of the auditorium itself but the greatly widened capacity of the platform and the ominous weather probably had influenced the new and effective disposition of the tremendously resonant units.

BERLIOZ was making no experiment when he wrote for such numbers. Not only was he but one of several in his day who was using that method to express what each one hoped would be exceptionally impressive, but his own sense of tonal values prompted him to indicate instrumentation that would result in the effects he clearly foresaw. And they are effective. The magnitude of his forces produces a feeling of grandeur quite apart from mere bulk, and it becomes one of the moments when the phenomenon that is music, is present in all its miracles.

As effective as it is, it is not at all surprising that Berlioz writes, for extreme contrast, sections of quiet plaints performed by much reduced forces between the most grandiloquent divisions. Thus after the Dies Irae he writes a "Quid sum miser" before another of the great impressive portions, the Rex tremendae, and, following that, a gentle chorus without accompaniment at all, "Quaerens me." The reasons for such antipodal colors are obvious, but that does not mar the validity of the larger conception. Indeed the procedure is enhanced by their very disparity.

TO SAY that Munch led all these forces would be a trifle less than accurate. He was in command. With unusually undemonstrative confidence he gave the lofty work a dignity and majesty in which extravagance would have been unsuitable. There is a single opportunity for a tenor soloist in the "Sanctus," and John McCollum acquitted himself with a distinction well in accord with the spirit of the music and the character of the performance. His easy power was more than artistically adequate, and his contribution was a highly valuable one.

As the final hushed and most distant chord was sounded in the lower registers of the orchestra, Munch kept his arms aloft immobile long after the last vibration had ceased; the viols kept their bows on quiet strings, the wind players their lips on the unsounding embouchures, and no one on stage or in the audience desired or dared disturb the reverent atmosphere that had been created.

Tanglewood Festival Draws 34,743, Largest Crowds Yet

The Berkshire Music Festival attracted the largest crowds of the current season over the weekend, with 29,541 persons attending the programs at Tanglewood Friday and Saturday nights and yesterday afternoon. Another 5,202 were on hand for the open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday morning.

Saturday Concert

The veteran conductor Pierre Monteux was on the podium for the Saturday concert. That opened with Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony" and "Piano Concerto No. 1." The second half of the program was devoted to the "Manfred" Overture and "Concert Piece," Op. 92, by Schumann, and the Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde," by Wagner. Rudolph Serkin was the piano soloist.

Yesterday afternoon, with Music Director Charles Munch conducting, the Boston Symphony played the "Symphony No. 4 in E," by Alexander Tcherepnin; the "Violin Concerto," by Mendelssohn, and the "Symphony No. 2," by Schumann. The Tcherepnin Symphony was written for and dedicated to Mr. Munch in 1957. It was performed by the orchestra in Boston last December.

Violin soloist yesterday was Isaac Stern, who commuted back and forth between Lenox and Philadelphia by air to meet his concert obligations. He attended the Saturday rehearsal with the Boston Symphony, returned to Philadelphia that evening for a concert at Robin Hood Dell and came back to Tanglewood Sunday morning.

In Final Week

The festival now goes into its final week. In addition to the regular Wednesday night chamber music concert and the three weekend programs in the big shed there will be the annual Tanglewood on Parade program Thursday evening. That will feature performances by various groups in the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's music school and the Boston Pops Orchestra under the direction of Arthur Fiedler.

The final weekend concert series will be devoted to the music of Beethoven.

'Requiem' of Berlioz Presented at Tanglewood

By Jules Wolffers

Lenox, Mass.

When Charles Munch first conducted the Berlioz Grande Messe des Morts, Opus 5, at the Invalides in Paris on June 16, 1937, he used 600 players and singers to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the work's first performance. Somewhat less than half that performing force was used last Friday night when Dr. Munch opened the fifth week of the current Berkshire Festival with a performance of the Requiem, dedicated to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky.

The Requiem has always been associated with vastness and huge sound. Undoubtedly the effect of the four added brass choirs in the "Dies irae" and the "Rex tremendae" is impressive. But if Dr. Munch has taught us anything, it is that the work does not need the ultimate in sound for effective presentation and, in fact, is more to be treasured for its qualities of tenderness and warmth than for its large proportions.

The conductor placed the brass choirs two to a side at the extremes of the front stage. The Festival Chorus was augmented by the University of Maryland Chapel Choir to bring the singers close to the numbers specified by the composer in his score. Together with the regular orchestra these performing forces were quite sufficient to give all the sound one could possibly desire.

Dr. Munch exercised remarkable control and achieved close cohesion throughout the entire work. Only once or twice did he need to marshal singers and players more closely together. For the rest, his directions concentrated on the aspects of subtlety and delicacy which lie just underneath the surface.

This was a noble and memorable performance, made so by the tenderness of the quieter sections. The high point of the evening came in the "Hostias" where John McCollum sang the tenor solo with the utmost distinction, beautifully seconded by the chorus in the responses.

After some roughness in the opening parts the chorus produced a generally smooth blend and good timbre. Hugh Ross and Lorna Cooke de Varon prepared the singers, and recognition should be given also to Fague Springmann, director of the University of Maryland forces.

Pierre Monteux was in particularly fine form for his guest appearance on the Saturday night program. Blending relaxation, ease, and control in just the right measure, the conductor allowed the Mendelssohn "Italian" Symphony to flow along, neither hampered by overtautness nor let loose with overindulgence. There was swiftness without racing, tenderness without sentimentality, excitement without freneticism, producing one of the finest projections of the score we have ever heard.

Rudolf Serkin was at his musicianly best as soloist in the Mendelssohn Concerto No. 1, in G minor, for Piano and Orchestra and in the rarely performed Schumann Concert Piece, the Introduction and Allegro appassionata, Op. 92. While the soloist did indulge himself in his propensity to sacrifice notes for speed from time to time, his interpretations showed all the finesse and understanding so abundantly available to him when he chooses to try for these qualities instead of acrobatics of power.

After intermission this reviewer gave the new acoustic canopy a thorough testing during the Schumann Overture to Byron's "Manfred," Opus 115, as well as the composer's piano-orchestra piece. While the piano tone is not always heard too clearly on the surrounding lawns, the orchestra as a whole sounds much better and clearer than it did previously. One had to move almost to the extremes of the grounds to lose the sound and the listeners within 50 yards circumference of the Shed hear the music with almost concert hall clarity and balance.

Music Review

Tanglewood Weekend Concerts

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE PENULTIMATE weekend of the Tanglewood season came to a close yesterday afternoon with a program containing the only contemporary work of the entire weekend. All the other works in the three concerts were by composers born within a decade of each other at the beginning of the 19th century.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had performed the great Berlioz "Requiem" Friday evening in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, who had been conductor of the orchestra for 25 years and who had also been the great force in the development of Tanglewood, and on Saturday evening had ventured as far as the Wagner Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde."

THE EXCEPTION and only contemporary work of the week was a symphony by Alexander Tcherepnin, his fourth, Op. 91, in E, dedicated to Charles Munch and conducted by him yesterday at the beginning of the afternoon's program. Tcherepnin, illustrious son of an also musically illustrious father, and father himself of a son evidently continuing in the same vocation on a similar level, is not easy to classify. There is novelty and ingenuity in his work and yet it is not consistently of this era. The outset of the first movement sounded to one who was hearing it for the first time as if it more properly belonged to one of the inner movements of a symphony. Indeed, he rearranged the three movements of his symphony from the more usual order to end with an andante with the central movement an allegro.

OTHERWISE THE programs were mainly Mendelssohn and Schumann. Pierre Monteux, who was guest conductor Saturday night, opened his program with as swift a performance of the "Italian" symphony of Mendelssohn as we can remember. Yet it did not tax the virtuosity of the Boston orchestra who easily dashed it off with brilliance. It was obviously a premeditated pace as Monteux beat it one-to-the-bar, although he allowed the body of the movement to relax and relent a trifle as he proceeded.

The lovely third movement is one of the most graceful moods in all music, and its performance by the Boston strings is always a pleasure greatly anticipated. The restrained sonority of the little bassoon and horn phrase in the trio by the Boston soloists is worth, speaking personally, the price of admission alone.

THE SYMPHONY on yesterday's program was the Schumann second, Op. 61, in C major. Munch gives this excellent shape and contour, and no symphony gives the fine orchestra greater scope. The two inner movements are gems of unsurpassed radiance. The pixie-like scherzo and lovely adagio have one factor in common which is not always apparent, and that is their perfect adaptability to the instruments to which they are assigned. The fiddlers scarcely have to move their hands to grasp in a single cluster the swift idiom Schumann wrote for them in the scherzo, and the same applies to the slower movement where the theme lies felicitously for the strings and expressively for the reeds.

Pierre Monteux

The soloist yesterday afternoon was Isaac Stern making his third and final appearance of the season, playing the Mendelssohn violin concerto. This time he had the freshest air a Berkshire summer can provide, and which compensated in a measure for the extremely humid conditions under which he played on his two previous appearances. We thought, too, that he did his best playing of the season yesterday. He played real Mendelssohn, elegant and courtly, with style and character. One needs no longer mention Stern's command of the instrument, and while that is consistently a marvel, it still needs to be channeled in musical directions. He unquestionably did so yesterday to the unbounded satisfaction and enthusiasm of the immense crowd.

MONTEUX'S program Saturday evening will not go down in our records as the most interesting of the year. It may hold the record as the longest. After the "Italian" symphony, he had the collaboration of ebullient pianist Rudolph Serkin, first, in the Mendelssohn concerto No. 1, in G minor, Op. 25, and then, after intermission, in a Schumann rarity, the concert piece, introduction and allegro appassionato, Op. 92, for piano and orchestra.

For our taste Serkin need only play a single octave scale or a C major triad, but we have rarely seen so much excitement over such bombast and fustian as he fumed over Saturday. Schumann gave the clarinet and the horn some rewarding solos in the introduction, but we believe music will be as well off if this work is given back to the archaeologists.

Monteux began the second half of his program with the Schumann overture to Manfred. This was Schumann at his loftiest. Byron has popped up ever so often in this Tanglewood season. He has been the inspiration for a half dozen pieces. Schumann has caught the passionate grandeur of Byron's drama and anyone familiar with the poem or with the Castle of Chillon on the edge of Lake Geneva sees the sorceries reinvoked with graphic animation. The Boston orchestra invests this kind of composition with vivid color and exciting spirit, as, indeed, it does all types of music.

Monteux closed his long program with Wagner. Psychiatrists may make of it what they will, but our copy to the editor mispelled overture as "overtire."

29,541 Throng Tanglewood During Record Weekend; Munch Powerful

Musical magnificence at Tanglewood this weekend encompassed many ingredients and drew a record total crowd of 29,541 persons to the Friday, Saturday, and Sunday concerts.

The largest attendance of the season at the Berkshire Music Festival marked the Saturday night performance when 12,441 persons traveled to Tanglewood. On Sunday afternoon, 9,700 persons attended and Friday night, 7,400.

An intense performance of the Requiem by Berlioz was conducted by Charles Munch Friday night. The dramatic theme of the work, the Day of Judgment, was stated worshipfully, ardently in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, former conductor of the Boston Symphony and founder of the festival.

One hundred and seventy voices from the Festival Chorus and the Univ. of Maryland Chapel Choir trained by Hugh Ross and Lorna Cooke de Varon; John McCollum, tenor soloist; and additional brass choirs combined with the orchestra into a controlled force which spelled out Berlioz' music with precision and passion.

Munch's interpretation was powerful: his orchestra played with ardor, his chorus sang clearly and effectivery.

Saturday night's performance shone with sheer brilliance as three composers of the Romantic Period, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Wagner, were heard. Pierre Monteux as guest conductor led the orchestra through melodies which sparkled, generated poetic fancy. Ovations resounded following each work.

Rudolf Serkin complemented the program as a piano soloist whose showmanship is enhanced by an ability to play very fast, yet shade meticulously. A virtuoso in the fullest sense his technique and interpretive sense made for rhythms and crescendos which shimmered.

His performance of Mendlssohn's Concerto No. 1 in G Minor for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 25, charmed the audience which accorded him and Mr. Monteux a tremendous ovation. Its gay, joyous rhythms fairly pirouetted from the keyboard as Mr. Serkin played gracefully, delicately. The exquisite melodies of the concerto were flavored with its youthfulness as Mr. Serkin emphasized its romantic air. His phrasing in the Andante movement was particularly good.

He underlined the exciting tempos and thoughtful melodies of Schumann's seldom performed Introduction and appassionato, Concert Piece for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 92, and was backed by a spirited orchestra.

Mr. Monteux delivered a fluid opening performance of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony No. 4 in A major, characterizing its polished from and radiance. The strings were especially seet in singing the colorful melodies. Schumann's Overture to Byron's "Manfred" was moody, full-toned.

A sumptuous performance of Wagner's Prelude to "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde" ended the concert on a note of bravado. The interweaving of the orchestra to explosive heights made for listening.

On Sunday afternoon, Mr. Munch again conducted the Boston Symphony in a concert with Isaac Stern as violin soloist. Mr. Stern's performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in E minor, Op. 64, showed that he was tired. He fitted his Tanglewood performance into a busy schedule between the Berkshires and Philadelphia. However, the orchestra played with spirit.

Mr. Munch's direction of Tcherepnin's Symphony No. 4 in E, Op. 91, was cohesive and his interpretation of Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C major, Op. 61 full of beauty.

ISAAC STERN DRAWS 9700 TO FESTIVAL

Violinist Flies From Philadelphia for Tanglewood Concert

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX — A perfect Berkshire day plus the lure of Mendelssohn's "Violin Concerto," played by Isaac Stern, and the popularity of Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew 9700 people to the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon. The three week end concerts drew a total of 29,541 persons to Tanglewood, a record week end thus far. Incidentally, the Saturday morning rehearsal which featured both Stern and Serkin drew 5202 people.

Busy Schedule

Mr. Stern is a very busy violinist this summer and he seemed tired Sunday afternoon, although he played with the precision and purity of tone which are characteristic of his performances. Charles Munch kept the concerto going at a brisk pace so there was no cloying sweetness. In fact, the opening movement was about as robust as we have ever heard it. The audience listened with a flattering intentness. Mr. Stern had flown here from Philadelphia to rehearse Saturday morning, then flew back to Philadelphia to play at Robin Hood Dell that evening and back to Tanglewood Sunday morning for the afternoon performance. An artist can stretch himself too far and should beware of too much at one time. Stern was tired and showed it in the Mendelssohn.

The program opened with the "Symphony No. 4 in E," by Alexander Tcherepnin, a work written for and dedicated to Charles Munch in 1957. It was performed in Boston last December.

This is an emphatic, affirmative piece of music marked by the solidity of a profound musicianship in many passages. It does not always fall pleasantly on the ear, but many of its passages, particularly those in which skillful use is made of the brasses, are impressive. Mr. Munch provided a spacious, energetic reaidng and the players made full use of the many opportunities for tonal display.

Schumann's "Second Symphony" seemed close to the heart of Mr. Munch as he unfolded its beauties. The work shows the joy of one who has come forth victorious from an illness, for such circumstances had preceded Schumann's writing of the symphony. It has its brooding moments, but mainly it seems to be an affirmation of joy. Mr. Munch seemed to be in a hurry and the work was often taken at excessive speed, but when things were calm, the music emerged in its full beauty.

Final Week End

Next week end concludes the festival and the closing work will be the traditional Beethoven "Ninth Symphony," when the brotherhood of man will be majestically uttered. The soloists will be Adele Addison, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; Isaac Stern, tenor and Donald Gramm, bass.

The chamber music concert by the Kroll String Quartet will consist of quartets by Beethoven, Hindemith and Brahms. The Friday concert will feature Beethoven's "Fourth Symphony" and the "Fourth Piano Concerto," with Rudolf Serkin as pianist. Serkin also will be the pianist in the choral fantasy with piano.

The Saturday program, also all Beethoven, will include the Fifth and Sixth Symphonies and the "Fidelio" overture. Pierre Monteux will conduct.

Music: Festival Report

Good Weather Adds Its Luster at Tanglewood

By HOWARD TAUBMAN
Special to The New York Times.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 2 — Let's face it, Oh ye who agitate for adventurous programs: the weather counts for at least as much as the music.

Last night and this afternoon the gods were kind. The air was dry and brisk last night, and today the sky was a refulgent blue and the clear air glorified the Berkshire Hills. Did it matter that the programs at Tanglewood were not particularly stimulating? Not at all.

The biggest crowd of the summer, 12,441 turned out last night. The official count today was 9,700, but judging by the throngs that covered the lawns, one should ask for a recount.

Even the rehearsal yesterday morning drew an audience of 5,202. There is a charge of $1 for adults and 25 cents for children. Rudolf Serkin and Isaac Stern were both on tap; nevertheless, that is a formidable turnout for a practice session. The Boston Symphony's pension fund was enriched by $4,500.

The most interesting program of the fifth week of the Berkshire Festival was on Friday night, when Charles Munch conducted a memorable performance of the Berlioz Requiem. This concert, which was dedicated to the memory of Serge Koussevitsky, the man who did most to make Tanglewood a fixture on America's artistic landscape, attracted only 7,400, but the weather was not first-rate.

This week-end the Boston Symphony has been on a Mendelssohn-Schumann kick. Wagner (the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan") muscled in on last night's program. Alexander Tcherepnin (Symphony No. 4 in E) broke in on the romantics' happy hunting ground today.

Pierre Monteux, looking as frisky as a lamb despite his 84 years, conducted exhilaratingly last night. He began the evening with a radiant, lighthearted performance of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony. With Mr. Serkin as the soloist, Mendelssohn's G minor Piano Concerto got a glowing interpretation. One remembers particularly the magical freshness of the slow movement. Only artists of such innocence of spirit could collaborate on so ingratiating and luminous an interpretation.

Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony brought the proper panache to Schumann's "Manfred" overture. Mr. Serkin then elected to offer the Introduction and Allegro, Op. 92, which is anything but vintage Schumann. He did what he could for the piece, and so did the Bostonians under Mr. Monteux, but it refused to come to life. The Wagner music was performed with resplendent spaciousness.

Isaac Stern

Today Mr. Munch began with the Tcherepnin symphony, which was composed at the conductor's behest and first performed under his direction in Boston last December. Though it seeks to keep things moving with an abundance of motor energy, in conformity with modern trends, the symphony's basic content is conservative. It is a pleasantly made work; one can respect it without admiring it. Mr. Munch led it with snap and vitality.

Mr. Stern played the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto with refinement of texture and soaring musicianship. Nevertheless, there were moments when he seemed to be pressing hard. Does one think so because one knows that the violinist was here yesterday morning for a rehearsal, in Philadelphia last night for a performance at Robin Hood Dell and back today for a concert? Mr. Stern has always been a bear for work, and he is the best judge of his resources. But there were intimations of weariness today.

The program ended with Schumann's Symphony No. 2. To one who chose to hear the final work while wandering on the lawn it was instructive to note how fine the acoustics were, thanks to the new stage shell, called the Talbot Canopy, which has been installed this year. It was also diverting to watch thousands of men, women and children taking their midsummer's ease as they listened to the symphony.

Music and nature—they make an attractive pair. Who wants provocative programs when the sun is warm? How can a festival resist easy success?

Attendance Continues To Rise At Berkshire Festival Events

TANGLEWOOD—Fair weather helped to swell the attendance at the weekend concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the third successive week. The biggest crowd of the season showed up Saturday night to hear Rudolf Serkin, the pianist, with Pierre Monteux conducting the BSO. Total paid attendance Saturday was 12,441.

Yesterday afternoon Dr. Charles Munch returned to the podium with the BSO and Isaac Stern as violin soloist, drawing 9,700 to the Music Shed and grounds surrounding the huge auditorium. Friday night's crowd of 7,400 was kept down because of a threatening thunderstorm at concert time, but the overall attendance for the weekend exceeded all others this season.

The Saturday morning rehearsal for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund drew a new record crowd of 5,202. Including the Wednesday night chamber concert, when 1,552 attended, the paid attendance for the week's events totaled 36,295.

With Tanglewood on Parade sold out for Thursday night—although general admission tickets are available—the final weekend at Tanglewood, with the help of the weatherman, may exceed all previous attendance records for the Festival.

An all-Beethoven concert Friday night will open the weekend series in the Music Shed, with Dr. Munch conducting the BSO. Mr. Monteux will conduct Saturday night, and Dr. Munch will close the 1959 season on Sunday afternoon, when the orchestra will give its traditional performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Boston Symphony Plays New Work

By DICK WEBER
Knickerbocker News Staff Writer

Into the Tanglewood album of old familiars, Charles Munch yesterday afternoon introduced the new sounds and romantic melodies of Alexander N. Tcherepnin, a Russian-born composer and pianist who has been teaching in the United States.

Tcherepnin's Symphony No. 4 in E, Op. 91, was written in 1957 for Mr. Munch, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and was first performed by this orchestra last Dec. 5.

As Mr. Munch led the Boston group once again in the playing of this new work, the crowd, which stretched Coney Island-like to the far edges of the green beach outside the music shed, rewarded it with almost dutiful applause.

THE RESPONSE was probably laconic because the crowd was waiting for a more obvious feature of the day, the appearance of violinist Isaac Stern, who played the solo part in Mendelssohn's exquisite Concerto in E Minor for Violin, Op. 64.

Tcherepnin's symphony, should not be dismissed casually. It is the work of a mature composer who has emerged from a strong family background of writing and conducting for ballet.

His father, Nicolai Tcherepnin, wrote ballets and conducted for Sergei Diaghilev. The son has written a ballet, "The Frescoes of Ajanta," which was produced by Anna Pavlova in 1923, and an opera, as well as compositions for chamber orchestras.

THIS BACKGROUND, apparently, is the source of the rhythmic intensity and melodic richness so obvious in the symphony yesterday.

Teherepnin has not fractured the language of music, as some modern composers have done. But he has added some innovations of his own, including a nine-step scale (Taken from E, it reads, E, F, G, G-sharp, A, B, C, C-sharp, D-sharp).

The Mendelssohn concerto gives the average listener some impression of how tremendously difficult it must be to acquire a skill on the violin even faintly akin to that possessed by Mr. Stern. A first movement full of displayful passage work, an impassioned andante ending with a cadenza jammed with trills and arpeggios, and a final movement which is a sparkling scherzo virtually worked Mr. Stern's bow to the bone.

To the crowd, his playing was sheer genius. It kept him trotting back on stage through 10 minutes of applause. Some think it was a sneaky way to get him to play an encore, but Mr. Stern outwitted them all. He came back the last time without his violin.

Schumann's Second Symphony was undoubtedly beautifully rendered, but the reviewer made a tactical error. He decided to experiment at this time wtih listening from the lawn, and gave up his seat inside. From outdoors, fully half the symphony was inaudible.

Music: Music Shed Concerts Finish Third Series

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — A romantic-contemporary program closed the third weekend series of Music Shed concerts here yesterday afternoon with Charles Munch conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Isaac Stern made his third and final appearance in this Berkshire Music Festival, playing the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto. His previous performances were the Tchaikovsky and Brahms concertos.

Yesterday's attendance was 9,- bringing the weekend total 29,541.

Of news and musical interest was yesterday's performance of Tcherepnin's Symphony No. 4 in E Major, Opus 91. It was composed in 1957 for Munch and dedicated to him. The Boston Symphony gave its premiere in Symphony Hall, Boston, last December.

Stunning Piece

The Tcherepnin Symphony is a stunning piece of contemporary music.

It explores many facets of modern idioms with logic and sometimes startling but engaging instrumental results.

The work starts off with a syncopated Prokofieff-type beat in staccato. Broad sweeps of the bow, swift tempo, and much cattering in woodwinds create unique effects. It's strictly modern with melodies that make unique impressions, probably because they are based on a nine-tone scale.

The first movement boils almost incessantly with repeated rhythmic figures.

Instead of the customary "andante" for the second movement, the symphony goes on to a more rapid pace. The movement is initiated with a whimsical dance motive in piccolo and flute, which spreads to other sections somewhat in the style of the opening movement. It involves fast and elaborate interjections from the concert master, and fascinatingly eerie sounds from choice instrumental combinations.

Its main resemblance to the waltz style that is claimed by the composer is the existence of a vague three-quarter beat.

A bucolic mood pervades the third movement, set off by an inoffensive melody in cellos with violas in the background. There follow some murky climaxes, insisted upon by repetetive figures in double bass. The work ends on a mysterious note with high-pitch dissonances prevailing.

Stern's Performance

Stern played the Mendelssohn concerto with the accent on technical flash and poetic insight. This attitude was manifest from the soulful melody in the solo instrument, supported by the string orchestra.

From this point on it was by no means a "one-man show." The orchestra's marvelous strings matched Stern's passages, brilliance for brilliance. The soloist made a "coup-d'etat" of the first movement cadenza, without defacing its musical merit for purposes of virtuosity.

The "andante" was sensitively played. The impassioned middle section developed into a mood of grave agitation, leading expediently into the brilliant finale.

In the final movement raced a blazing trail of brilliance and technical adroitness, marred briefly by slight disagreements of tempo between soloist and orchestra.

By and large, Munch and the orchestra were at all times zealous and efficient in giving Stern his wants — very few arguments about style, tempo, or dynamic balances.

Schumann Symphony

Schumann's Symphony in C Major, No. 2, Opus 61, received a respectful and vitalized performance—perhaps too vitalized in the second movement, which sped along impatiently.

The first movement was well-supplied with the serious grandeu that's so typical. In spite of excessive speed of the "scherzo," it was absolutely articulate, heavily accented, and displayed beautiful work by the woodwinds in the trio section.

Saturday Concert

Rudolf Serkin was piano soloist at the Saturday night concert, attended by 12,441.

The program: Mendelssohn's Fourth or "Italian" Symphony; Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto No. 1 in G Minor; Schumann's "Manfred" Overture; Schumann's Introduction and Allegro Appassionato, concert piece for piano and orchestra, Opus 92; and the prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

As you can see, Serkin's assignment was two "bon-bons"— the Schumann was most sugary and the Mendelssohn concerto was slightly less saccharine.

It can't be overlooked that an obligation exists to please as many festival patrons as possible. After all, they are paying the tab.

At the rehearsal Saturday morning, the Schumann poesie received a variety of reactions — some from members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There were 5,202 persons at the rehearsal, and they were most cordial to Serkin, and possibly to the music he played. One orchestra player was disgusted. "In Europe," he said, "people would walk out on the Schumann. They would expect to hear it only at a student recital."

Another player said: "I've never admired Serkin as much as today."

Bottom of Barrel

Schumann's Introduction and Allegro Appassionato is a pallid piece of music. It is dangerously close to being sickeningly tender, seemingly scraped from the bottom of the emotional barrel.

The Introduction is more interested in the woodwinds than the solo instrument. The piano has broken chord figures ad finitum. Serkin, being Serkin, made them seem as interesting as possible. When he came to the more elaborate stuff in the Appassionato section, he made that look as difficult as possible.

But it didn't quite come off— the technical fuss or the schmaltz.

The Mendelssohn concerto was a happier excursion into the obvious. Since it hasn't much else than the making of a good graduation vehicle, the Serkin performance was unusually brilliant.

Textbook Exercise

The first and final movements were taken at breakneck speed, which didn't rush either soloist or pianist. Serkin played the scales, chords, arpeggios, and octaves like thoroughly mastered material from the advanced text book.

There wasn't much else to do with the slow movement but let it sentimentalize, which was done to the hilt. And with this pastoral reverie was truly beautiful tone from the piano and all kinds of sympathetic response from orchestra.

The rhythm of the finale was a bit ragged, presumably due to the speed, but the pianist did his best to give hoop-la to the movement, in which he was eminently successful except for occasional wrong notes.

Monteux

Vibrant is the word for Monteux's interpretation of the "Italian" Symphony. The opening theme rang out with full tone and rhythmic vitality. It would take an orchestra like the Boston to fulfill Monteux' expectations adquately. The movement was filled with youthful exuberance and tremendous elan — all of which Monteux extracted with the greatest economy of gesture.

There was a haunting quality in the second movement — particularly in its governing theme. Nor was in dawdled over, as sometimes happens. Changes of volume were pronounced and instantaneous. The third movement was completely graceful but didn't neglect its undercurrents of restlessness. The brass trio was accurate and given in round, rich tones.

The "Saltarello" movement was taken a bit slower than expected by comparison with the first, thereby acquiring a clarity and precision that enhanced it as a strictly modelled dance form.

Next Weekend

"Tanglewood on Parade" is next Thursday. During the late afternoon, exhibitions will be given by students of the Berkshire Music Center. In the evening Fiedler will conduct the Boston Pops in an all-Gershwin program with Earl Wild as piano soloist.

The final weekend of regular shed concerts begins Friday night. It's an all-Beethovan series. Friday night's program includes Symphony No. 4; Choral Fantasia with Piano (Rudolf Serkin, soloist); and Concerto No. 4, also with Serkin.

TANGLEWOOD
July 31, August 1
by A. C. S.

Had Berlioz himself been on the podium at Tanglewood Friday evening, it is doubtful whether the performance of his Grande Messe des Morts would have sounded better. Given in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, the concert proved once again the tremendous affinity Charles Munch has with this music. The greatly enlarged orchestral forces and the Festival Chorus, which was augmented by the University of Maryland Chapel Choir, were perfectly controlled and beautifully molded by the conductor. John McCollum, in his brief but demanding tenor solo, was also in top form. Special mention should be made of the near perfect diction of the large chorus. In all, it was a powerful, mature, and dedicated performance, better experienced than talked about.

Pierre Monteux was in charge of the orchestra Saturday evening. Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony got things started, excitingly paced, especially the finale where the triple tonguing of the winds really sparkled.

Rudolf Serkin made his first appearance of the evening in the Mendelssohn Piano Concerto No. 1. He made more of the first movement than seemed warranted, but the remainder was refreshing. The artist later returned to play a rarely heard opus, the Concert Piece for Piano and Orchestra by Schumann. Although both soloist and conductor strove to make something of the work, their efforts proved to be in vain.

Schumann's "Manfred" Overture and Wagner's Prelude and Liebestod from Tristan completed the program.

29,541 Attend Fifth Weekend At Tanglewood

By JOHN F. KYES

LENOX — The fifth weekend of the Berkshire Festival drew to Tanglewood 29,541 for three concerts. Monteux and Serkin were a strong attraction on Saturday, when 12,441 crowded the music shed and lawn.

Friday evening was dedicated to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky, with an epic performance of the Berlioz "Requiem." Charles Munch conducted, the tenor was John McCollum, and the Festival Chorus was prepared by Hugh Ross and Lorna Cooke de Varon. The regular brass section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was greatly increased as demanded by this massive score.

Sunday afternoon brought the Tcherepnin Fourth Symphony, composed for and dedicated to Munch, and first performed last December in Boston. Isaac Stern was soloist in the ever-popular Mendelssohn Violin Concerto, and the weekend emphasis on Schumann as one of several romaticists was continued by the playing of his Symphony No. 2 in C major.

All of Saturday's music was well played. Some had valid worth and some was shallow, but all of it fascinated the huge audience. Pierre Monteux, with his famous economy of gesture, drew the richest of tone from the orchestra in the final number, the Pelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde." He gave the Mendelssohn Fourth (Italian) Symphony a casual, gay, fast start. The reins were left almost frighteningly loose in the opening movement. The second movement, sober but not sad, brought beautifully clean precision in the strings. The leisurely, song-filled third movement had fine work for the French horns.

Still more impressive was the musical depth programmed in the Schumann Overture to Byron's "Manfred." This was restless music, but uplifting and extremely dynamic. The full resources of the orchestra sang, and in the middle of this work were unbelievably gorgeous chunks of cello and viola tone.

The wizardry of Rudolf Serkin was devoted to two works which would have sounded better if one had no memories of the previous week's Brahms. The Mendelssohn Concerto No. 1 in G minor, for Piano and Orchestra, seemed for the most part brittle and nervous music, meant for show rather than depth. Monteux and Serkin were less united in purpose in the opening "Molto con fuoco" than in the final "Presto: Molto allegro e vivace." The "Andante" with its hymnlike main theme abounded in poetic piano passages.

Memorable in the later program was the Schuman Concert Piece, Op. 92, whose introduction began with a perfect accord between the piano and the big orchestra. The sense of ineffable peace established here was soon broken by exclamations and passionate crescendos, which maintained a sense of importance in pite of undoubted striving for effect. Serkin was magnificent in his interpretations as well as his inimitable acting-out of the music.

Large Crowds At Concerts In Lenox

(Special To The American)

LENOX, MASS. — The finest week end of music so far this summer drew 29,541 people to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival for three programs which had fine merit and excellence of performance. Rudolf Serkin, performing the music of Mendelssohn and Schumann before 12,441 at Saturday night's concert, gave such a brilliant and moving performance at the piano that even he out did his previous brilliant performances at Tanglewood.

Isaac Stern, violinist, playing Mendelssohn for 9,700 at the Sunday afternoon concert gave a fine performance and was called back again and again.

The week end began with an impressive performance of Berlioz' "Grande Messe des Morts, Op. 5" in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, for many years conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and instrumental in establishing Tanglewood. Charles Munch, conducting the orchestra in music for which he seems to have a special affinity, led his musicians through a fresh and rich performance. The Festival Chorus, prepared by Hugh Ross and Lorna Cooke de Varon, was augmented by the University of Maryland Chapel Choir.

It was Serkin's inspired performance Saturday night before the largest single audience of the summer that was the high spot of the season to date. It was a splendid performance. We have probably said the same thing about Serkin's playing during the past several years. Serkin gets better with age. He was much less nervous than on some other occasions and his performance of the Mendelssohn "Concerto No. 1, in G. minor, for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 25" followed by Schumann's "Introduction and Allegro, appassionato, Concert Piece for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 92" left no doubt that there was a master giving one of his best performances.

Pierre Monteux, conducting Saturday night's performance led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through one of its finest performances. The program itself was one of the best too, including Mendelssohn's "Symphony No. 4, in A major (Italian), Op. 90" and concluding with Wagner's "Prelude and Liebestod from Tristan and Isolde." The men of the orchestra gave Serkin such an ovation that it was clear they too loved the fine lyrical qualities coupled with the vigorous, spirited performance of their soloist.

Sunday afternoon's concert with Charles Munch conducting included Tcherepnin's "Symphony No. 4, in E, Op. 91," written for Munch and first performed by the Boston in 1958. Based on a liturgical theme the selection merited considerable interest and was well applauded. Stern, playing the Mendelssohn "Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, in E minor, Op. 64," played with ease to a rapt audience that called him back four times to the stage when he had finished At both Saturday night and Sunday afternoon prformances there were numerous shouts of "bravos" and they were well deserved. The concluding selection was Schumann's "Symphony No. 2, in C. major, Op. 61." Weather for Saturday and Sunday was ideal and the audiences took full advantage of the facilities at Tanglewood.

From 6 to 11 p. m. on Thursday night it will be the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center. This year it will be a Gershwin Festival with music of "An American In Paris" "Porgy and Bess," "Rhapsody In Blue" and other Gershwin numbers. For the final week end of the Berkshire Festival season, beginning Friday night there will be the music of Beethoven with Serkin Friday night and the Fifth and Sixth Symphonies Saturday night and Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony" with soloists and Festival Chorus Sunday afternoon.

Music: Music Shed Concerts Finish Third Series

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — A romantic-contemporary program closed the third weekend series of Music Shed concerts here yesterday afternoon with Charles Munch conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Isaac Stern made his third and final appearance in this Berkshire Music Festival, playing the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto. His previous performances were the Tchaikovsky and Brahms concertos.

Yesterday's attendance was 9,700, bringing the weekend total to 29,541.

Of news and musical interest was yesterday's performance of Tcherepnin's Symphony No. 4 in E Major, Opus 91. It was composed in 1957 for Munch and dedicated to him. The Boston Symphony gave its premiere in Symphony Hall, Boston, last December.

Stunning Piece

The Tcherepnin Symphony is a stunning piece of contemporary music.

It explores many facets of modern idioms with logic and sometimes startling but engaging instrumental results.

The work starts off with a syncopated Prokofieff-type beat in staccato. Broad sweeps of the bow, swift tempo, and much cattering in woodwinds create unique effects. It's strictly modern with melodies that make unique impressions, probably because they are based on a nine-tone scale.

The first movement boils almost incessantly with repeated rhythmic figures.

Instead of the customary "andante" for the second movement, the symphony goes on to a more rapid pace. The movement is initiated with a whimsical dance motive in piccolo and flute, which spreads to other sections somewhat in the style of the opening movement. It involves fast and elaborate interjections from the concert master, and fascinatingly eerie sounds from choice instrumental combinations.

Its main resemblance to the waltz style that is claimed by the composer is the existence of a vague three-quarter beat.

A bucolic mood pervades the third movement, set off by an inoffensive melody in cellos with violas in the background. There follow some murky climaxes, insisted upon by repetetive figures in double bass. The work ends on a mysterious note with high-pitch dissonances prevailing.

Stern's Performance

Stern played the Mendelssohn concerto with the accent on technical flash and poetic insight. This attitude was manifest from the soulful melody in the solo instrument, supported by the string orchestra.

From this point on it was by no means a "one-man show." The orchestra's marvelous strings matched Stern's passages, brilliance for brilliance. The soloist made a "coup-d'etat" of the first movement cadenza, without defacing its musical merit for purposes of virtuosity.

The "andante" was sensitively played. The impassioned middle section developed into a mood of grave agitation, leading expediently into the brilliant finale.

In the final movement raced a blazing trail of brilliance and technical adroitness, marred briefly by slight disagreements of tempo between soloist and orchestra.

By and large, Munch and the orchestra were at all times zealous and efficient in giving Stern his wants — very few arguments about style, tempo, or dynamic balances.

Schumann Symphony

Schumann's Symphony in C Major, No. 2, Opus 61, received a respectful and vitalized performance—perhaps too vitalized in the second movement, which sped along impatiently.

The first movement was well-supplied with the serious grandeu that's so typical. In spite of excessive speed of the "scherzo," it was absolutely articulate, heavily accented, and displayed beautiful work by the woodwinds in the trio section.

Saturday Concert

Rudolf Serkin was piano soloist at the Saturday night concert, attended by 12,441.

The program: Mendelssohn's Fourth or "Italian" Symphony; Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto No. 1 in G Minor; Schumann's "Manfred" Overture; Schumann's Introduction and Allegro Appassionato, concert piece for piano and orchestra, Opus 92; and the orelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

As you can see, Serkin's assignment was two "hon-heas"—the Schumann was most suggestive and the Mendelssohn concerto was slightly less saccharine.

It can't be overlooked that an obligation exists to please as many festival patrons as possible. After all, they are paying the tab.

At the rehearsal Saturday morning, the Schumann poesie received a variety of reactions — some from members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There were 5,202 persons at the rehearsal, and they were most cordial to Serkin, and possibly to the music he played. One orchestra player was disgusted. "In Europe," he said, "people would walk out on the Schumann. They would expect to hear it only at a student recital."

Another player said: "I've never admired Serkin as much as today."

J. KATTS

Visit to the Berkshires

Lennox, Mass. — In one week here at the Berkshire Music Festival on the grounds of Tanglewood I have heard more interesting music than in almost the whole of the past summer and winter season.

Admittedly, this is a rather extravagant thing to say. But it is nevertheless quite true. Any man's appetite for Brahms, Beethoven and Tchaikovsky can be sated within a reasonably short while; enough, in any case, to demand a respite. Perhaps this is why Tanglewood exists—a place for the program-weary souls of big-city backgrounds to come and clean their ears.

FOR ONE, I was delighted to find myself finally listening to a good bit of that contemporary music about which everyone reads or talks, but never hears. There was a lecture-recital by the young French pianist, Paul Jacobs, which included extraordinary performances of several of the Debussy "Etudes," Stravinsky's "Ragtime," Anton Webern's "Variations," and a work by the newest German pathfinder, Karl-Heinz Stockhausen.

Another lecture-concert brought forth a set of brilliant songs by Italy's Luigi Dallapiccola to words by Goethe. They are astonishingly beautiful and were performed to perfection.

Following a rather inane discussion of the problems of playing and understanding contemporary music by composer-conductor-pianist Lukas Foss, a well-rehearsed ensemble gave a reading of the "Adagio" movement of Alban Berg's "Kammerkonzert" for winds, piano and violin solo.

Though both of these men—Berg and Dallapiccola—are now established as two of the foremost creative minds of this century, I can't recall hearing even once in the past decade a work by either in Philadelphia.

A SONATA-RECITAL by violinist Alexander Schneider, accompanied by composer Leon Kirchner, presented two rarely-heard Mozart works plus Kirchner's own "Duo Sonata," a fine-grained, extremely expressive score.

"Sascha" Schneider, of course, played beautifully in the Mozart works; but more surprisingly, with an extraordinary flair in the Kirchner piece. It's odd that this man who plays contemporary music so well has never been identified with it more closely in the public's eyes. Kirchner, a sort of "coming thing" in American music, played all of the accompaniments with a great deal of elan.

AT THESE CONCERTS, I tumbled over Philadelphians right and left. It was almost like walking through Rittenhouse Square at lunch hour. Many had come for the weekend concert given by Rudolph Serkin with the Boston Orchestra under Pierre Monteaux. In addition to one of the Mendelssohn concertos which he did earlier at the Dell, he played a "Concertpiece" by Robert Schumann. This work is rarely done; I may be wrong, but I believe Serkin is about the only man to have played it in this country.

The treat of the entire week, however, was a very moving performance of Hector Berlioz' mammoth "Requiem Mass" in the big shed under the direction of Charles Munch. This, too, is another one of those pieces everyone talks about but never hears. To some extent, the hugeness of the concept and its required forces stands as an explanation. Beyond this, there is no excuse for its not being played, save that the work needs a champion of the stature of Munch.

I RARELY CRY or experience goosebumps at concerts. This one was an exception for me, as it surely was for some 8,000 other souls. The audience was so moved that it sat in silence for several minutes before exploding into applause at the end. A rather famous composer, known not to be overly fond of Berlioz, was even touched enough to shout "Magnificent!" over and over again.

TANGLEWOOD
AUGUST 2 (SUNDAY)
by E. G. B.

Alexander Tcherepnin composed his Fourth Symphony for Charles Munch, who conducted a performance of it last Sunday at Tanglewood, with the Boston Orchestra. It is on the whole a happy, spirited, and interesting work. Pizzicato strings and generous use of the woodwinds convey light, bright rhythms, which late in the second movement are fortified by the brasses for an intensification of effect. The last movement, which is liturgical in origin, utilizes Tcherepnin's characteristic nine tone scale. The counterpoint and harmonies he evolves from this are at times astringent, but not nearly as frightening as one might pre-suppose.

Isaac [illegible] in the Mendelssohn [illegible] Concerto was at the top of his form. Although it is a display piece for the soloist, the technical difficulties could be happily forgotten in a performance of tender, loving absorption. The artist's imagination and understanding were ever present in the whole gamut of tone color and refinement of shading.

A more routine rendering of Schumann's Second Symphony closed the program. Although the Scherzo movement was on the whole too heavy, and the Adagio dragged, the performance was smooth and the climatic ending led to resounding applause.

Second Thoughts on Music

Fine Performances Mix With Strange Programs

Pierre Monteux Remains in Top Form; Munch Conducts Fitting Memorial; Festival Chorus Outstanding; Stern Tired

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX — This has been a week of fine performances and strange programming. For instance, Rudolf Serkin wasted his magic on the Mendelssohn "Concerto No. 1 in G minor" and Schumann's Introduction and Allegro appassionata, a Concert Piece for Piano and Orchestra. Both works could have remained in oblivion and not been missed. However, it may be said that Serkin, as usual, managed to make both works sound better than they really are.

In Top Form

Pierre Monteux was on the podium and provided, among other things a delightful lighthearted, bouyant performance of Mendelssohn's Italian symphony and a glowing performance of the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde." The 84-years-young French conductor has been in top form this season.

The climax of this season, as far as this listener is concerned was the performance of the Berlioz "Requiem" conducted by Charles Munch. I doubt if I ever heard a finer performance of this work and it was a fitting memorial to Serge Koussevitsky. The Festival Choir was augmented by the Maryland University Chapel Choir. The Festival Chorus has been trained by Lorna Cooke de Varon, and a wonderful job she did. Hugh Ross assisted in training the Chapel Choir. I remember no finer chorus in many years.

Better than any conductor we know, Charles Munch understands the Berlioz "Requiem." When we first heard him conduct it, the effect throughout was hair-raising. A second time, he had calmed it down, but this last performance was the deepest felt of all. The contrasts between use of the full resources at his command and use of more limited resources were uncanny. Berlioz had written that "If I were threatened with the destruction of the whole of my works, save one, I would crave mercy for the Requiem." Mr. Munch's performance was a masterly planning of contrasts and a shrewd mixing of orchestral colors. John McCollum, one of the best of American tenors, sang the "Sanctus" with confidence and generally fine tone. As for the choir, it sang as if inspired and articulated with unusual clarity.

Profound Musicianship

Sunday afternoon's concert, directed by Charles Munch brought us a performance of Tcherepnin's "Symphony No. 4 in E." This is a work which often falls unpleasantly on the ear, but bears the mark of profound musicianship and a flair for the theatrical, particularly in the use of brasses.

Isaac Stern, violinist, appearing for the third time, played the Mendelssohn "Violin Concerto in E minor." He played the work with his usual beauty of tone and stunning musicianship, but it was obvious that he was tired. He had flown from Philadelphia for a rehearsal on Saturday, then back to play at Robin Hood Dell Saturday night and then returned here for the Sunday afternoon performance.

It was one of those perfect Berkshire afternoons and Schumann's joyous second symphony never sounded more beautiful. Everything fitted together to emphasize its joy, and Mr. Munch was in his best spirits.

Chamber Music Concert

Alexander Schneider, violinist and Leon Kirchner, composer-pianist, joined forces for the Wednesday night chamber music concert. Mr. Schneider is a musician and performer of superior attainments and Mr. Kirchner is a far better pianist than many composers we have heard play. Mr. Schneider offered two Mozart sonatas, those in B flat, K. 454 and E flat major, K. 481. Both violinist and pianist brought a fine musicianship and elegance to the performances. In between the Mozart sonatas was a "Sonata Concertante for Piano and Violin," written in 1952 by Leon Kirchner. It is a show piece with ample opportunities for solo display by both participants. It is a terrific test for the violinist, but Mr. Schneider was equal to all its demands.

This afternoon the final concert of the Festival will be given in the Music Shed. The traditional close for the Berkshire Festival is Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony." Why, we do not know, unless it is deemed fitting that an audience leave with the brotherhood of man theme ringing in its ears. The soloists will be Adele Addison, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; Blake Stern, tenor, and Donald Gramm, bass.

Visit to the Berkshires

Lennox, Mass. — In one week here at the Berkshire Music Festival on the grounds of Tanglewood I have heard more interesting music than in almost the whole of the past summer and winter season.

Admittedly, this is a rather extravagant thing to say. But it is nevertheless quite true. Any man's appetite for Brahms, Beethoven and Tchaikovsky can be sated within a reasonably short while; enough, in any case, to demand a respite. Perhaps this is why Tanglewood exists—a place for the program-weary souls of big-city backgrounds to come and clean their ears.

FOR ONE, I was delighted to find myself finally listening to a good bit of that contemporary music about which everyone reads or talks, but never hears. There was a lecture-recital by the young French pianist, Paul Jacobs, which included extraordinary performances of several of the Debussy "Etudes," Stravinsky's "Ragtime," Anton Webern's "Variations," and a work by the newest German pathfinder, Karl-Heinz Stockhausen.

Another lecture-concert brought forth a set of brilliant songs by Italy's Luigi Dallapiccola to words by Goethe. They are astonishingly beautiful and were performed to perfection.

Following a rather inane discussion of the problems of playing and understanding contemporary music by composer-conductor-pianist Lukas Foss, a well-rehearsed ensemble gave a reading of the "Adagio" movement of Alban Berg's "Kammerkonzert" for winds, piano and violin solo.

Though both of these men—Berg and Dallapiccola—are now established as two of the foremost creative minds of this century, I can't recall hearing even once in the past decade a work by either in Philadelphia.

A SONATA-RECITAL by violinist Alexander Schneider, accompanied by composer Leon Kirchner, presented two rarely-heard Mozart works plus Kirchner's own "Duo Sonata," a fine-grained, extremely expressive score.

"Sascha" Schneider, of course, played beautifully in the Mozart works; but more surprisingly, with an extraordinary flair in the Kirchner piece. It's odd that this man who plays contemporary music so well has never been identified with it more closely in the public's eyes. Kirchner, a sort of "coming thing" in American music, played all of the accompaniments with a great deal of elan.

AT THESE CONCERTS, I tumbled over Philadelphians right and left. It was almost like walking through Rittenhouse Square at lunch hour. Many had come for the weekend concert given by Rudolph Serkin with the Boston Orchestra under Pierre Monteaux. In addition to one of the Mendelssohn concertos which he did earlier at the Dell, he played a "Concertpiece" by Robert Schumann. This work is rarely done; I may be wrong, but I believe Serkin is about the only man to have played it in this country.

The treat of the entire week, however, was a very moving performance of Hector Berlioz' mammoth "Requiem Mass" in the big shed under the direction of Charles Munch. This, too, is another one of those pieces everyone talks about but never hears. To some extent, the hugeness of the concept and its required forces stands as an explanation. Beyond this, there is no excuse for its not being played, save that the work needs a champion of the stature of Munch.

I RARELY CRY or experience goosebumps at concerts. This one was an exception for me, as it surely was for some 8,000 other souls. The audience was so moved that it sat in silence for several minutes before exploding into applause at the end. A rather famous composer, known not to be overly fond of Berlioz, was even touched enough to shout "Magnificent!" over and over again.

TANGLEWOOD
AUGUST 2 (SUNDAY)
by E. G. B.

Alexander Tcherepnin composed his Fourth Symphony for Charles Munch, who conducted a performance of it last Sunday at Tanglewood, with the Boston Orchestra. It is on the whole a happy, spirited, and interesting work. Pizzicato strings and generous use of the woodwinds convey light, bright rhythms, which late in the second movement are fortified by the brasses for an intensification of effect. The last movement, which is liturgical in origin, utilizes Tcherepnin's characteristic nine tone scale. The counterpoint and harmonies he evolves from this are at times astringent, but not nearly [illegible] frightening as one might [illegible].

Isaac [illegible] the Mendel[illegible]concerto was at the top [illegible] form. Although it is a display piece for the soloist, the technical difficulties could be happily forgotten in a performance of tender, loving absorption. The artist's imagination and understanding were ever present in the whole gamut of tone color and refinement of shading.

A more routine rendering of Schumann's Second Symphony closed the program. Although the Scherzo movement was on the whole too heavy, and the Adagio dragged, the performance was smooth and the climatic ending led to resounding applause.

Second Thoughts on Music

Fine Performances Mix With Strange Programs

Pierre Monteux Remains in Top Form; Munch Conducts Fitting Memorial; Festival Chorus Outstanding; Stern Tired

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX — This has been a week of fine performances and strange programming. For instance, Rudolf Serkin wasted his magic on the Mendelssohn "Concerto No. 1 in G minor" and Schumann's Introduction and Allegro appassionata, a Concert Piece for Piano and Orchestra. Both works could have remained in oblivion and not been missed. However, it may be said that Serkin, as usual, managed to make both works sound better than they really are.

In Top Form

Pierre Monteux was on the podium and provided, among other things a delightful lighthearted, bouyant performance of Mendelssohn's Italian symphony and a glowing performance of the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde." The 84-years-young French conductor has been in top form this season.

The climax of this season, as far as this listener is concerned was the performance of the Berlioz "Requiem" conducted by Charles Munch. I doubt if I ever [illegible] formance of this work and it was a fitting memorial to Serge Koussevitsky. The Festival Choir was augmented by the Maryland University Chapel Choir. The Festival Chorus has been trained by Lorna Cooke de Varon, and a wonderful job she did. Hugh Ross assisted in training the Chapel Choir. I remember no finer chorus in many years.

Better than any conductor we know, Charles Munch understands the Berlioz "Requiem." When we first heard him conduct it, the effect throughout was hair-raising. A second time, he had calmed it down, but this last performance was the deepest felt of all. The contrasts between use of the full resources at his command and use of more limited resources were uncanny. Berlioz had written that "If I were threatened with the destruction of the whole of my works, save one, I would crave mercy for the Requiem." Mr. Munch's performance was a masterly planning of contrasts and a shrewd mixing of orchestral colors. John McCollum, one of the best of American tenors, sang the "Sanctus" with confidence and generally fine tone. As for the choir, it sang as if inspired and articulated with unusual clarity.

Profound Musicianship

Sunday afternoon's concert, directed by Charles Munch brought us a performance of Tcherepnin's "Symphony No. 4 in E." This is a work which often falls unpleasantly on the ear, but bears the mark of profound musicianship and a flair for the theatrical, particularly in the use of brasses.

Isaac Stern, violinist, appearing for the third time, played the Mendelssohn "Violin Concerto in E minor." He played the work with his usual beauty of tone and stunning musicianship, but it was obvious that he was tired. He had flown from Philadelphia for a rehearsal on Saturday, then back to play at Robin Hood Dell Saturday night and then returned here for the Sunday afternoon performance.

It was one of those perfect Berkshire afternoons and Schumann's joyous second symphony never sounded more beautiful. Everything fitted together to emphasize its joy, and Mr. Munch was in his best spirits.

Chamber Music Concert

Alexander Schneider, violinist and Leon Kirchner, composer-pianist, joined forces for the Wednesday night chamber music concert. Music Of The Romantic Period At Tanglewood

Composers of the Romantic Period will be featured in the Tanglewood programs of the coming weekend on Friday and Saturday evenings, July 31 and August 1, at 8:30 and Sunday afternoon, August 2 at 2:30.

Charles Munch, Music Director, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Shed on Friday evening, July 31. His program will be devoted in its entirety to the Requiem of Hector Berlioz, which will be presented as a memorial to the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky who was the Orchestra's Music Director for twenty-five years and who founded the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. The tenor soloist will be John McCollum and the Festival Chorus, prepared by Hugh Ross and Lorna Cooke DeVaron, will be joined by the University of Maryland Chapel Choir, Fague Springmann, conductor. Additional brass players will join the regular orchestra to form the four brass choirs which are heard in the "Dies Irae," "Tuba Mirum" and "Lacrymosa" of the great Requiem Mass.

Saturday's Berkshire Festival program will be conducted by Pierre Monteux, whose varied program will include Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony No. 4 in A major, Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto No. 1 in G minor with Rudolf Serkin as soloist, Schumann's "Manfred" Overture and the same composer's Introduction and Allegro appassionato for Piano and Orchestra (again with Rudolf Serkin). The program will close with the Prelude and Love Death from Wagner's' "Tristan and Isolde."

Gershwin Week in N. England Next Week

Next week is Gershwin Week in New England: throughout the six New England states the music of George Gershwin, famed American composer who died in 1938, will be played and sung — under the stars, on the radio and over television programs, in a salute to the young composer who created the first truly native music of his time.

At Tanglewood in the Berkshires, on Thursday, Aug. 6, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will offer an All-Gershwin program for the special "Tanglewood-on-Parade" celebration featuring Earl Wild playing "Rhapsody in Blue" and Adele Addison and Robert McFerrin singing the songs of "Porgy and Bess."

High point of the celebration will be the New England premiere at the Astor Theatre in Boston next Thursday of the new Samuel Goldwyn production in Todd-AO and color of the classic folk tale "Porgy and Bess" with George Gershwin's music set to the lyrics of Dubose Heywood.

Tanglewood On Parade Program Is Thursday

Saturday evening's concert at Tanglewood in the Berkshires by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Pierre Monteux, found a near record crowd of 12,500 people storming the gates, the box-office besieged throughout the first half of the program.

The program included Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony in A major, beautifully performed, His Piano Concerto, No. 1 in G minor, played with fine finesse and flair by Rudolph, Schumann's Overture to Byron's Manfred, his Concert Piece for Piano and Orchestra, also performed by Mr. Serkin and one Wagner work, the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," thrilling in its controlled intensity. The inimitable Mr. Monteux was given a cheering ovation by the enthusiastic listeners.

Sunday's blue skies saw 9700 gathered for a pleasant program of three works conducted by Charles Munch.

Tcherepnine's Symphony No. 4 is dedicated to, and was commissioned by, Dr. Munch, and is one of the more really enjoyable of the contemporary pieces. Facile orchestration, light in mood, much of the intricate rhythmic pattern and melodic development is heard in the wind and brass instruments, the strings taking a percussive role much of the time in the first two movements. The last, andante, liturgical in character, asked one to absorb too many progressive "seconds," and almost took away the charm of the preceding movements.

What makes a performance memorable is a breathless excitement transmitted by the artist, through whatever composer he happens to be interpreting, to his audience. This was not the case in Isaac Stern's playing of Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor. While technically near perfection, for us it lacked the epitome of elegance, the "cantilene," the hushed quality inherent in this obligatory vehicle of violinists everywhere. The audience apparently approved his interpretation however, and recalled Mr. Stern and Dr. Munch many times both very graciously acknowledging the ovation.

Perhaps to remind us of Schumann's questionable inability to write symphonies, or even to recall Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony of Saturday evening (which can be heard in the fourth movement) Dr. Munch chose to give and produced a vigorous and searching reading of Schumann's Second Symphony in C major. "Searching" could well apply to the symphony itself, so bewildered and wandering in achieving any real development or fulfillment. The enthusiastic audience lingered long to express their appreciation.

Thursday will once again see Tanglewood on Parade, with Arthur Fiedler conducting a Gershwin Festival, piano soloist, Earl Wild assisting. Reserved and box seats purchasers may attend a Mozart concert in the hemlock garden at 4; for others the festivities begin at 5:45.

The last weekend of the Berkshire Festival will feature Beethoven, his 4th Symphony, the Fantasy in C minor for Piano, Chorus and Orchestra, and the Fourth Piano Concerto, with Rudolph Serkin again as soloist. On Saturday evening Mr. Monteux will open with the "Fidelio" Overture followed by the Fifth and Sixth Symphonies. Sunday Dr. Munch will close the season with the traditional performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.—M. deB. B.

Rain Expected To End Tonight Before Tanglewood Parade

All reserved seats and boxes in the Music Shed have been sold for tonight's gala Tanglewood on Parade program which will benefit the Berkshire Music Center.

Arthur Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra arrived at Tanglewood this morning from the west coast and rehearsed the orchestra for tonight's "Gershwin Festival" in the Shed, starting at 8:15.

9,500 Brave Rain to See '59 Tanglewood on Parade

More than 9,500 music lovers were present yesterday for the annual Berkshire Musical Festival showpiece, "Tanglewood on Parade," which was held in the rain.

Pops Concert

Fans crowded the grounds near Lenox for the 6½-hour program featuring performances by the Berkshire Music Center pupils and the appearance of the Boston Pops Orchestra with its famed conductor, Arthur Fiedler, which presented a program of music by George Gershwin in the evening.

The all-student portion of the program got underway at 4 o'clock with a presentation by the Tanglewood Study Group and a Mozart concert. These were followed by a welcoming address by Ralph Berkowitz, dean of the 300-student Berkshire Music Center. Following the talk, simultaneous programs were offered by the Music Center Orchestra, a student choral group, and chamber music ensemble which played original compositions by Music Center students. The Tanaglewood Choir then completed the student portion of the program, which was followed by the day's highlight, the Gershwin concert.

Forced Under Shelter

Cloudy skies and a steady drizzle during the afternoon and evening forced all concerts to be held under shelter, although traditionally several are scheduled for the outdoors. Many non-reserved ticket holders overflowed the main shed and those who could not find shelter under trees spread blankets and tarps on the wet lawn.

Funds received from this annual event go to the Tanglewood fund to help support the Berkshire Music Center.

'Tanglewood On Parade'

Hardy Music Lovers Reign at Annual Fete

More than 9500 intrepid classical music lovers were at shower-dampened Tanglewood Thursday for the annual Berkshire Music Festival showpiece, "Tanglewood on Parade."

Fans crowded the sweeping grounds near Lenox for a 6½-hour program featuring performances by Berkshire Music Center students and capped by the appearance of the Boston Pops Orchestra and its famed conductor, Arthur Fiedler.

Under Way at 4

The all-student portion of the program was under way at 4 p. m. with a presentation by the Tanglewood Study Group and a Mozart concert.

These were followed by the welcoming address, delivered by Ralph Berkowitz, dean of the 300-student Berkshire Music Center.

Following Mr. Berkowitz's short talk, simultaneous programs were offered by the Music Center orchestra, a student choral group, and a chamber music ensemble playing original compositions by Music Center members.

Then the Tanglewood Choir held stage center, completing the student portion of the program. It was followed by the day's highlight, an all-Gershwin concert by the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Traditionally a few of the performances are scheduled for outdoors, where patrons can relax on close-cropped lawns.

But cloudy skies and a steady drizzle backed by chilly breezes dominated the afternoon and evening, and all programs were held under shelter.

Despite the weather, however, many non-reserved-seat ticket holders overflowed the main music shed onto the green.

Resigned to Price

Those who couldn't find shelter under the trees spread blankets and tarps on a wet lawn, apparently resigned to accepting the damp weather as part of the price they had to pay for this once-a-year event.

As usual at Tanglewood, the dress ranged from formal to casual.

Fully-dressed Music Center officials and performers mingled with bermuda-shorted college girls and bearded beatnicks.

Many Youngsters

There were a host of youngsters attending, the majority of them by the bus-load from camps throughout the Berkshires.

Although a few lawn-sitters sipped luke-warm coffee and nibbled on soggy sandwiches, there was little picnicking on the green, a favorite Tanglewood pastime.

Funds received through Thursday's concert will go into the Tanglewood fund to help support the Berkshire Music Center.

19 Years Old

The 19-year-old center, established by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, provides young musicians with a chance to continue their professional training under the guidance of experienced musicians and teachers.

Students this summer traveled from across the United States and from throughout the world to attend the six-week course, culminated by their appearance in "Tanglewood on Parade."

Gershwin Airs Hold Stage At Tanglewood

By JOHN F. KYES

LENOX — "Tanglewood On Parade," the annual gala event of many facets, unrolled merrily yesterday in spite of light rain. Its entire intake of $25,000 went to the Berkshire Music Center, whose advanced students from all over the world staged several hours of demonstrations touching the heights of difficulty and novelty.

The climax as usual was the evening concert, attended by 9,793, and blessed by a letup in the rain. Whereas in recent years the program has been divided between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the "Pops," last night the latter held complete sway. Under Arthur Fiedler's baton, and with Earl Wild as solo pianist, the group offered a whole evening of the music of George Gershwin.

Though this was fun, it was also the height of something or other. Gershwin's music long ago ceased to be modern. It is an American novelty, and such can best be treated as all specialties, and put into a program in moderation.

Full Program

Before leaving the subject of the afternoon and early evening, one should note the richness of the things offered. At 4 p.m., there were simultaneous concerts by the Tanglewood Study Group (choral and orchestral and by a group of 13 wind instruments. At 6 o'clock, the student orchestra performed under various young conductors, there was a choral concert with several directors, and the Fromm Fellowship Prayers offered compositions of Center students. At 7 o'clock, the Tanglewood Choir sang. In this and in the concert an hour earlier, Mualama Providakes, contralto, of Worcester was among the soloists.

Every Gershwin pianist seems to have his own chart of details, nor would I consider Fiedler's approach and ensemble as being the ideal way of getting a literal performance of, for instance, the Concerto in F. But for my money, Wild and the famous conductor were conveying the spirit of the music. The soloist had smart, slick accents, and was technically fluent. Even the crispness of his phrasing was often buried. Some of the best moments in the concerto were allotted to the orchestra. In the second, slow movement, there were extremely tuneful wailings for the trumpet and other winds. The piano became more nearly the boss in the final "Allegro agitato."

'American in Paris'

The orchestra's initial offering, "An American in Paris," left me comparatively cold, through the somewhat dated twitterings of Parisian street noises, but there was richness and interest in the long, lazy jazz song followed by a brash trumpet tune.

Russell Bennett's "symphonic picture" based on "Porgy and Bess" started in to be impressive, in moods ranging from naive to noisy, but finally settled down, in spite of fantastic interludes, to the agreeable task of plugging the good old tunes.

To me, everythhing about the "Rhapsody in Blue" spelled out a better performance than that of the Concerto. Both Wild and Fiedler were in fine fettle, and were recalled many times.

The concert ended with a souped-up version of "Strike Up the Band" and the completely stirring Sousa classic, "The Stars and Stripes Forever." The audience went wild, and simply yelled for more, but it had been a long evening and one encore had to serve in place of last year's six.

Beethoven concerts tonight, Saturday night and Sunday afternoon will complete the 1959 Berkshire Festival.

Crowd of 9,793 Overflows Music Shed Despite Rainy Skies and Damp Grounds

Tague

Undaunted by rainy weather and damp grounds, this group of picnickers brought along a beach umbrella and other paraphernalia to protect them from the elements on the grounds outside the Music Shed before the Pops concert last night.

TANGLEWOOD — The weatherman failed to put a damper on the 13th annual Tanglewood on Parade program held last night for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center. Despite low temperatures, rainy skies and damp grounds a crowd of 9,793 filled the 6,000-seat Music Shed to overflowing.

The sum of $26,698.50 was grossed from the parade, compared to the record $33,000 raised last year when a record crowd of 14,588 turned out in perfect weather for the event. The last time it rained for Tanglewood on Parade was 1955.

Arthur Fiedler conducted the Boston Pops Orchestra in the entire concert, with Earl Wild as piano soloist.

A new record was set last night for the largest number of buses transporting people to the parade. Fifty three buses were parked in the west lot. The last previous high was set last year when 48 buses were parked there during the parade.

The weather held down some of the festive parts of the night. Many of the pre-concert supper parties on the Tanglewood lawn were either canceled or held under cover at places other than Tanglewood.

However, George E. Judd, former manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Girard L. Spencer of New York City, a summer resident of Stockbridge, held their "turkey and martini" party as they have for all previous parades. Many guests dropped by to renew acquantacies with the retired BSO manager.

Door Prize Winners

Eight of the 10 door prizes offered last night were won by persons staying in Berkshire County.

The prize of "Weekend in the Berkshires" was won for the second year in a row by a county resident, Dr. Stanley Simkin of 11 Emerson Ave., Pittsfield. He won a weekend for two at Festival House in Lenox, a pastel portrait by Anthony Toney, pottery by J. David Broudo and jewelry by Yonny Siegel.

Other prize winners were George Quirk of 533 West St., Pittsfield, an RCA Victor high fidelity set; Miss Margaret T. Cullen of 77 Orchard St., Pittsfield, a pair of season tickets to next year's BSO Shed concerts at Tanglewood; Mrs. Laura Padovano of New York City, a guest at Birchwood Inn, Lenox, an oil painting by Harry Lane of "Stockbridge Bowl;" and Lance LaPoint of Walker Street, Lenox, a rocking horse.

Also, Henrietta Kessler of Yonkers, N.Y., a lady's coat from the Berkshire Coat Factory; Mrs. Myron Burdete of the Curtis Hotel, Lenox, a Belfoca camera from Whitestone Photos; Mrs. Ida Ziskind of 280 Williams St., Pittsfield, a General Electric table radio; Mrs. Ruth Hurwitz of Merrywood, Lenox, an "Evening in the Berkshires" consisting of tickets for two at the Berkshire Playhouse and Williamstown Theater and dinner for two at the Log Cabin Club and the 1896 House; and Mrs. Estelle London of Bellerose, N.Y., five records and one book from the Tanglewood Music Store.

Winning tickets were picked by Mrs. Eleazar de Carvalho, wife of the head of the conducting department at the Berkshire Music Center. William J. Cox, chairman of the Friends of the BMC, announced the winners.

Mrs. George W. Edman was chairman of the door prize committee. Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky was chairman of the parade committee; Miss Margo Miller, secretary; Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, chairman of the box sales with Mrs. Thomas D. Perry Jr., assistant chairman.

Tanglewood On Parade Has Downbeat Accompaniment of Rain's Pitter-Patter

Featured during the annual "Tanglewood on Parade" Thursday were performances by the 300 students comprising this year's summer class at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox. Above is a portion of the white-clad choir which gave an evening concert.

Rain-dampened spectators vied for shelter under the huge semiopen music shed and in nearby buildings when simultaneous performances were under way. The overflow spilled onto the lawn and sought protection beneath umbrellas or bundled in raincoats.

This threesome arrived early enough to search out a dry spot under a tree. Girls are Sally, left, and Carroll Willim of New York City with companion John Gillette of Scarsdale, N. Y. Group was one of few which tried picniking on rain-soaked Tanglewood green.

Boston Pops, Pianist Earl Wild Please 'Parade' Listeners; Student Groups Heard

By WILLARD M. CLARK

LENOX — Tanglewood-on-Parade in the rain was a pretty grim proposition during mid-afternoon Thursday.

Sites Are Moved

There were a few hardy souls who braved the rain to wander sort of aimlessly around the grounds trying to find the various brands of entertainment being offered, but not at the sites listed on the program due to the weather.

However, rain or no rain, the hordes arrived around 6 o'clock and took over in a big way. Everyone got in everyone else's way and good manners were at a premium.

Incidentally, some of the rainy day costumes were more bizarre than those seen on sunny days. Food seemed the major interest of all concerned and there were long lines in front of the food counters and any place which gave protection from the elements had its quota of umbrella sheltered picnickers.

Students Conduct

There were some interesting shows going on, as, for example the concert by the student orchestra during which students conductors took over and directed works which they had directed during the past weeks. The orchestra plays well and, in some cases, notably in the case of Norwegian Sverre Bruland, there was excellent conducting.

The concert scheduled for the formal gardens moved to the theater-shed, where the concert consisted of a performance of the seldom heard "Serenade" for 13 Wind Instruments, K. 361, by Mozart. Its six movements were wafted melodiously and with technique. Another concert by the chorus gave conductors chances to conduct works they may never conduct again, and the chorus to sing works it may never sing again.

However, the study of these works has proved beneficial to both student conductors and students. If one really wanted to know what has been going on in the Music Center there was ample opportunity to do so, but it was damp experience.

$25,160 in Receipts

For many weeks the shed has been completely sold out, which means that there were 6000 present. The total attendance at this annual fete is estimated at 9793 and the total intake for this affair has been $25,160 and it all goes to the Berkshire Music Center. A very profitable rainy festival of Gershwin music.

There seems no reason to dwell at length on Arthur Fiedler and his Boston Pops Orchestra. World-famed, both conductor and orchestra are universally popular. Better than most, Mr. Fiedler knows how to put together a program of music with something for everyone and he usually manages to summon from his players the most gigantic fortissimi to be heard.

In the program of music by George Gershwin which was heard Thursday night, the bright particular star was pianist Earl Wild. Under any standard Wild is a superior pianist. He knows his Gershwin and plays it with consummate ease and authority. His performance of the "Concerto in F" for piano and orchestra was probably as fine as one may hear these days.

Has Plenty Power

Even when it appeared he and Mr. Fiedler were not in complete agreement as to tempi, particularly in the second movement, everything went easily and brilliantly, for there are few quiet moments in this concerto. Wild has plenty of power and he needed it and his rhythmic sense is sure and instant. The same characteristics which made the performance of the concerto so admirable were found in his playing of the more popular "Rhapsody in Blue."

Russell Bennett's symphonic picture for orchestra based on "Porgy and Bess" has become a classic. It is the work of a skilled craftsman and a sensitive one. The lovely melodies unfold, one after the other in fascinating array. Mr. Fiedler and his men provided an admirable performance.

The program opened with the nostalgic music of "An American in Paris." Music a bit faded now, but music which brings back memories of happier days. The closing work was a medley of tunes from "Strike Up the Band," the sort of music in which the Boston Pops and its conductor have always excelled.

Music Review

Tanglewood on Parade

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

TANGLEWOOD on Parade is the greatest musical show on earth. Each year on the final Thursday of the Berkshire Festival there is a tremendous exhibition of all the activities which engage the artists and the students who come for the intensive six weeks of concerts and study.

The only factor not on exhibit last night was the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

All the forces of the Berkshire Music Center, the school maintained in conjunction with the concert series, displayed their wares. There was chamber music in The Barn by the Tanglewood study group conducted by Jacob Avshalomov and Florence A. Dunn; an outdoor concert by student wind players conducted by Louis Speyer; a fanfare conduced by Roger Voisin and an address of welcome by Center dean Ralph Berkowitz; a concert by the student orchestra conducted by Eleazar de Carvalho; a choral concert conducted by Alfred Nash Patterson; a program by the composition department performed by the Fromm Fellowship players; a choral and orchestral concert conducted by Hugh Ross; and then, as a grand finale, the gala concert in the Music Shed with Arthur Fiedler conducting the "Boston Pops" Orchestra.

THE POPS program was all Gershwin. The audience, amazing in numbers in view of the weather, went into frenzies of enthusiasm from the start and rarely descended below the mere level of ecstacy. The concert included all the best-known of the Gershwin catalogue: An American in Paris, a "Porgy and Bess" medley, and the two big works for piano with orchestra, the concerto in F and "Rhapsody in Blue." Pianist Earl Wild was soloist in both, and gave an extremely vital account of the rhythmical characteristics which identify the late American composer.

Gershwin was of the previous generation, but no one has supplanted him in his unique spot in music, somewhere between popular and serious music, if we ever can agree on just what these two terms mean. The fact remains that his appeal is universal. We thought the "Porgy and Bess" symphonic picture arranged by Russell Bennett did not do Gershwin justice. There is more pathos and less orchestral manipulation in the poignant score of Gershwin.

GERSHWIN started out on Tin Pan Alley and he has now arrived, to stay, we would guess, on the concert stages of the world. Although he has been gone some 22 years, his appeal has consistently aggrandized until today there is no music more capable of releasing the hidden or repressed instincts of both young and old.

Fiedler injects a wonderful and proper rowdyism in his Gershwin. Soloist Wild was every bit as imbued with the spirit of the music and the occasion, and they all made the evening a peak in Tanglewood enthusiasm and memories for the near 10,000 who disregarded skies and rain.

The audience would never have let the musicians and Fiedler go if they had had their own way. Only after the lights had been turned up and the orchestra men started to leave their seats did anyone in the audience finally agree that he had had a night.

LEWOOD ON PARADE
hursday, August 6
by R. L.

And afternoon and evening of varied music was climaxed with an all-Gershwin concert as thousands joined the Parade through the Tanglewood grounds, sampling offerings from Mozart to Prokofieff.

Starting at 4 in the afternoon, two chamber music groups were playing simultaneously, one in the Barn and the other in the Formal Garden. These concerts involved works of early composers (Toeschi, Purcell, Binchois) for the most part, refreshing for their simplicity of melodic line but interesting in the complexity of their variations. Selections by Henry Brant and Paul Hindemith brought us back, pleasantly, to the present; the "Frau Musica" by Hinemith offered some particularly exciting harmonies.

At 5:45 a Fanfare rolled out across the wide lawns, performed by students of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and followed by a welcome from Ralph Berkowitz, Dean of the Berkshire Music Center.

At 6 p.m. the Student Orchestra displayed their fine talents in performances of Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner, and Prokofieff. Different conductors led each piece, each of them quite poised and confident in their interpretations. Noteworthy in this concert was the rendition of Beethoven's Concerto No. 5 for piano and orchestra; Eugenia Hyman, a student from New Jersey, acted as soloist and gave the work a sensitive performance, a little weak in the forceful sections but absolutely brilliant in the more delicate passages. Also at 6 a choral concert was presented in the Theatre-Concert Hall and a composition session was played in the Chamber Music Hall; the Department of Composition is headed by Aaron Copland, assisted by Leon Kirchner and Lukas Foss. The Fromm Fellowship Players were the performers.

At 7 p.m. the Tanglewood Choir gave a magnificent and moving presentation of Hovhaness' "Magnificat" on the Main House Porch, assisted by instruments from the Orchestral Department.

The Gala Concert at 8:15 in the Music Shed, conducted by Arthur Fiedler with an augmented Pops Orchestra, was dramatic, colorful, and simply relaxing. Gershwin's music always satisfies a real need to sometimes hear lyrical expression couched in loose (but never careless) classical style. The Orchestra opened with the bright "American in Paris," followed by a truly spectacular performance of the Concerto in F, for Piano and Orchestra, with Earl Wild acting as soloist. After intermission, the Orchestra gave a symphonic picture of "Porgy and Bess" by Russell Bennett, a beautiful condensation of the original score. Then Earl Wild again took the stage for "Rhapsody and Blue," anti-climatic after the Concerto. Getting completely hammy (but fun), the Orchestra romped through "Strike up the Band" as the closing number and then marched the happy crowd out of the gates with a blasting "Stars and Stripes Forever."

Music: 7-Hour Program

13th 'Tanglewood on Parade' Is Given at Lenox—Boston Pops Plays

By ROSS PARMENTER
Special to The New York Times.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 6—Every year the Berkshire Music Festival stages "Tanglewood on Parade," a side show fo rthe benefit of its scholastic wing, the Berkshire Music Center. This year's parade was held in a drizzle. Nevertheless it raised $25,160, for almost 9,800 persons turned out today for the seven-hour show.

It was a cross between Parents' Day, Children's Day and a pop concert. With beautiful weather its divergent elements might have merged into a pleasant memory of music heard not too critically on a happy outing. But with intermittent showers and unremitting dampness, it tended to be a somewhat trying hodge-podge.

The big evening event was an all-Gershwin program by the Boston Pops Orchestra, with Arthur Fiedler conducting and Earl Wild as the piano soloist. It attracted the sort of audience that might be expected; one made up largely of persons without very much musical sophistication, and with a high percentage of teen-agers.

"Every camp in the Berkshires is here tonight," is the way one young camper was heard to describe the crowd to another camper. And from the box-office point of view this was fortunate. Only hardy campers would turn out in such numbers on such an evening. But it was hard on the rest of the program, or rather the programs, for the 300 students of the Berkshire Music Center presented no fewer than six programs and a fanfare.

The trouble was that the programs of the students were hardly the sort the campers wanted to hear. And three of those student events had to shift indoors. Thus the performance of Mozart's Serenade for Thirteen Wind Instruments, instead of being given among the clipped hedges of the formal garden, was played in the Theatre-Concert Hall.

The fanfare and welcome, instead of being given on the lawn, were delivered under the Shed, and the performance of Alan Hoyhaness' "Magnificat, planned to be given on the porch of the main house as people ate picnic suppers as they feasted their eyes on the Stockbridge Bowl, was also in the Theatre-Concert Hall.

With many events going on simultaneously, this listener could not hear them all, but he was impressed with the vigor and lyricism of Vincent Frohne's String Trio, one of the works played in the chamber music concert given by the composition department.

The young women of the Tanglewood Choir sang soft passages with especial sweetness of tone. And the seventy-five-piece student orchestra, under a succession of student conductors, did nobly.

One wishes, in fact, that the talented and musical students had been given the whole "parade" to themselves.

Then they could have shown their capacities more fully among more receptive listeners. But then perhaps such an arrangement would not have brought in so much money to help pay for their support.

The high point of the Gershwin program was the playing of Mr. Wild. Always his tone was musical in sound and subtly nuanced. His playing, too, had plenty of virtuosity, and he understands the Gershwin idiom, with its alternating melancholy and exuberance.

His performance was always expressive, often poetic and also often exhilarating.

The Boston Pops Orchestra is the Boston Symphony, minus its first deck men. Mr. Fiedler led the familiar players in "An American in Paris," "Strike Up the Band," Russell Bennett's symphonic arrangement of "Porgy and Bess" and the two works played by Mr. Wild, Concerto in F and "Rhapsody in Blue."

Perhaps the dampness accounted for the music not having all the zip it might have had on a clearer night. This as the thirteenth 'Tanglewood on Parade." It might have been an unlucky number.

Nearly 10,000 See Tanglewood Parade Event

Rainy skies, the first in a number of years, kept the number of interested observers and listeners down to 9,737 at the annual Berkshire Music Center's Tanglewood on Parade last Thursday.

The crowd included people of all ages, including many youngsters, from as far away as Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

The festivities started at 4:00 with an excellent performance, in the theatre shed, instead of the garden, of Mozart's Serenade for 13 Wind Instruments. At 5:45, a fanfare by Arthur Benjamin, conducted by Roger Voisin and performed by students, preceded a welcome by Ralph Berkowitz, dean of the Berkshire Music School.

We heard very interesting contemporary compositions in the Chamber Music Hall, part of a cohesive string trio by Vincent Frohme from La Porte, Indiana; a Fantasy for violin and piano by Karl Korte from Troy, N. Y., was expertly performed, carefully composed, brilliant but not showy. Both Mr. Korte and Leon Kirchner showed excellent understanding of the instruments used, Mr. Kirchner in his String Quartet which was pleasing and provocative.

In the music shed, the student orchestra gave a sensitive reading of Wagner's Overture from The Meisterdinger, directed by Diego Pacheco from Sao Paulo Brazil, and a spirited but rather unbalance performance of Prokofieff's Andante from his Fifth Symphony, conducted by Sverre Bruland from Oslo, Norway.

After picnicking in various spots throughout the grounds, the audience listened to Arthur Fiedler and his Pops Orchestra in an all Gershwin program. Starting with the graphic American in Paris, Earl Wild then gave a brilliant and sensitive performance of the jazz classic Concerto in F major.

Following intermission during which Mme. Carvalho assisted William Coe, chairman of the Berkshire Friends of Music in announcing winners of the numerous and attractive door prizes, the inimitably haunting Porgy and Bess was stirringly performed by the Pops Orchestra and Mr. Fiedler, with all its colorful changes.

Again Earl Wild projected a sincere and vigorous picture of the always popular Rhapsody in Blue. Strike Up the Band was the printed close of the program, but the always generous Mr. Fiedler contributed many encores.

The audience, while not as noisily demonstrative as usual gave thunderous waves of applause to show their approval of the day's Parade of the Berkshire Music Center's accomplish-

This is Morris Cove Day, annual production of "49 Groaners." It also marks homecoming of native son to Morris Cove. That would be Guy Masella, who with his orchestra provides music for Sea Cliff Inn phase of program tonight.

That performance begins busy week for Guy, only one-armed saxophone player we've ever seen. Masella unit will be playing Exchange Club's Musical Festival on East Haven Green, Tuesday; at Hamden Plaza from 9 to 11 on Thursday night and at annual Feast of Assumption program, Woodbridge, following night.

Incidentally, Guy is grateful to George Theodos of Goldie's Music Shop, who constructed special saxophone, according to his specifications, enabling him to continue playing after loss of arm in auto accident some 12 years ago.

Nearly 10,000 See Tanglewood Parade Event

Rainy skies, the first in a number of years, kept the number of interested observers and listeners down to 9,737 at the annual Berkshire Music Center's Tanglewood on Parade last Thursday.

The crowd included people of all ages, including many youngsters, from as far away as Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

The festivities started at 4:00 with an excellent performance, in the theatre shed, instead of the garden, of Mozart's Serenade for 13 Wind Instruments. At 5:45, a fanfare by Arthur Benjamin, conducted by Roger Voisin and performed by students, preceded a welcome by Ralph Berkowitz, dean of the Berkshire Music School.

We heard very interesting contemporary compositions in the Chamber Music Hall, part of a cohesive string trio by Vincent Frohme from La Porte, Indiana; a Fantasy for violin and piano by Karl Korte from Troy, N. Y., was expertly performed, carefully composed, brilliant but not showy. Both Mr. Korte and Leon Kirchner showed excellent understanding of the instruments used, Mr. Kirchner in his String Quartet which was pleasing and provocative.

In the music shed, the student orchestra gave a sensitive reading of Wagner's Overture from The Meisterdinger, directed by Diego Pacheco from Sao Paulo Brazil, and a spirited but rather unbalance performance of Prokofieff's Andante from his Fifth Symphony, conducted by Sverre Bruland from Oslo, Norway.

After picnicking in various spots throughout the grounds, the audience listened to Arthur Fiedler and his Pops Orchestra in an all Gershwin program. Starting with the graphic American in Paris, Earl Wild then gave a brilliant and sensitive performance of the jazz classic Concerto in F major.

Following intermission during which Mme. Carvalho assisted William Coe, chairman of the Berkshire Friends of Music in announcing winners of the numerous and attractive door prizes, the inimitably haunting Porgy and Bess was stirringly performed by the Pops Orchestra and Mr. Fiedler, with all its colorful changes.

Again Earl Wild projected a sincere and vigorous picture of the always popular Rhapsody in Blue. Strike Up the Band was the printed close of the program, but the always generous Mr. Fiedler contributed many encores.

The audience, while not as noisily demonstrative as usual gave thunderous waves of applause to show their approval of the day's Parade of the Berkshire Music Center's accomplish-

LEWOOD ON PARADE
Thursday, August 6
by R. L.

And afternoon and evening of varied music was climaxed with an all-Gershwin concert as thousands joined the Parade through the Tanglewood grounds, sampling offerings from Mozart to Prokofieff.

Starting at 4 in the afternoon, two chamber music groups were playing simultaneously, one in the Barn and the other in the Formal Garden. These concerts involved works of many composers. (Toeschi, Purcell, Binchois) for the most part, refreshing for their simplicity of melodic line but interesting in the complexity of their variations. Selections by Henry Brant and Paul Hindemith brought us back, pleasantly, to the present; the "Frau Musica" by Hindemith offered some particularly exciting harmonies.

At 6:45 a fanfare rolled out across the wide lawns, performed by students of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and followed by a welcome from Ralph Berkowity, Dean of the Berkshire Music Center.

At 6 p.m. the Student Orchestra displayed their fine talents in performances of Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner, and Prokofieff. Different conductors led each piece, each of them quite poised and confident in their interpretations. Noteworthy in this concert was the rendition of Beethoven's Concerto No. 5 for piano and orchestra; Eugenia Hyman, a student from New Jersey, acted as soloist and gave the work a sensitive performance, a little weak in the forceful sections but absolutely brilliant in the more delicate passages. Also at 6 a choral concert was presented in the Theatre-Concert Hall and a composition session was played in the Chamber Music Hall; the Department of Composition is headed by Aaron Copland, assisted by Leon Kirchner and Lukas Foss. The Fromm Fellowship Players were the performers.

At 7 p.m. the Tanglewood Choir gave a magnificent and moving presentation of Hovhaness' "Magnificat" on the Main House Porch, assisted by instruments from the Orchestral Department.

The Gala Concert at 8:15 in the Music Shed, conducted by Arthur Fiedler with an augmented Pops Orchestra, was dramatic, colorful, and simply relaxing. Gershwin's music always satisfies a real need to sometimes hear lyrical expression couched in loose (but never careless) classical style. The Orchestra opened with the bright "American in Paris," followed by a truly spectacular performance of the Concerto in F, for Piano and Orchestra, with Earl Wild acting as soloist. After intermission, the Orchestra gave a symphonic picture of "Porgy and Bess" by Russell Bennett, a beautiful condensation of the original score. Then Earl Wild again took the stage for "Rhapsody and Blue," anti-climatic after the Concerto. Getting completely hammy (but fun), the Orchestra romped through "Strike up the Band" as the closing number and then marched the happy crowd out of the gates with a blasting "Stars and Stripes Forever."

The Social Whirl

TRADITIONALLY the biggest party event of a Berkshire summer is Tanglewood on Parade, replete with elaborate spreads of food and fluids on the lawn. Rain made this event a trifle spongy this season, but a few slickered souls partied anyway. Before and after the close of Tanglewood there were other social doings, including the opening of art exhibitions, garden club teas, and, of course, the never-ending parade of cocktail parties at the homes of the socially inclined.

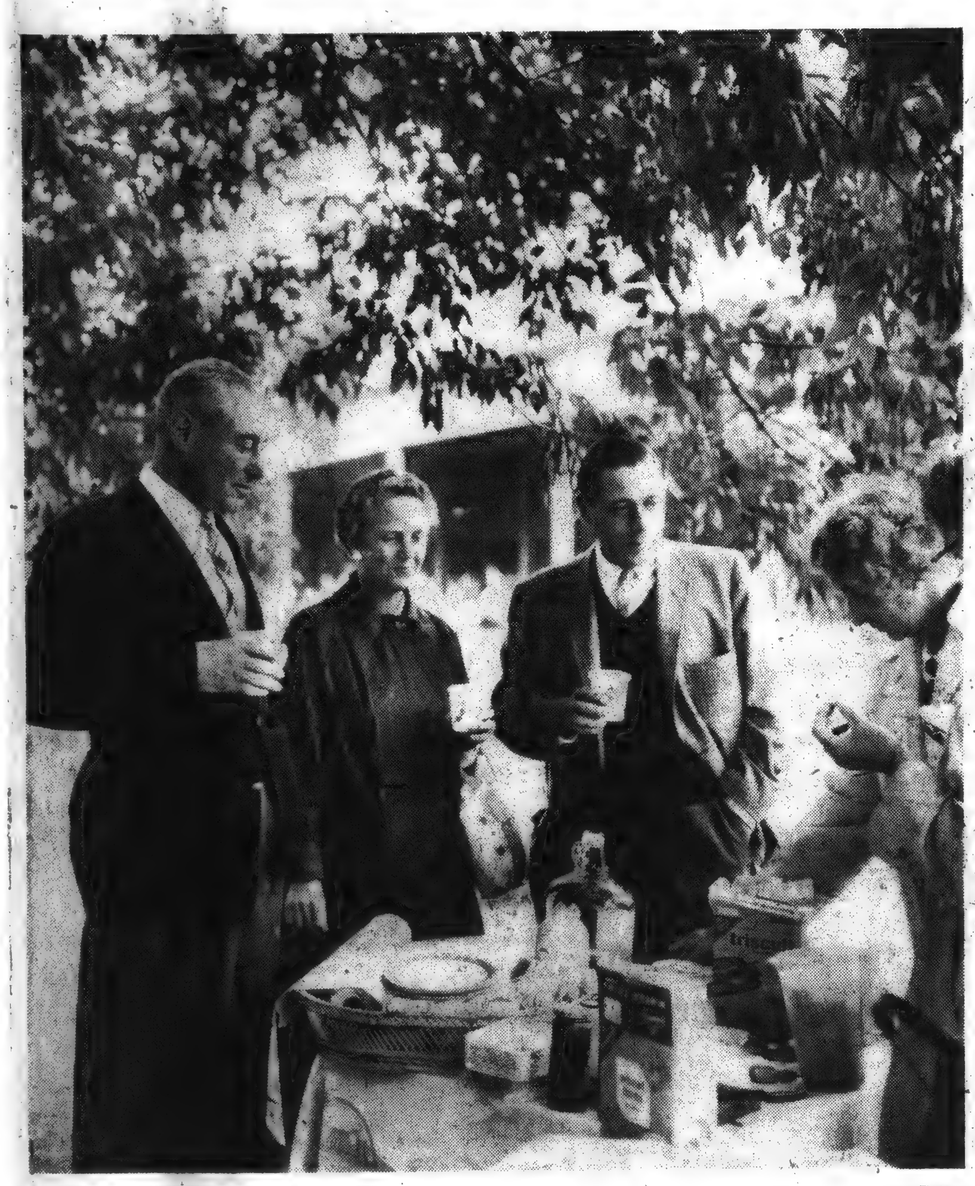
With Mrs. Eleanor Arnold Clark of Great Barrington at opening of her month-long retrospective exhibition of paintings at the Berkshire Museum are Dr. and Mrs. Henry Field of Tyringham and Coconut Grove, Fla. He's a writer, archaeologist and anthropologist. Mrs. Field is a former lion tamer.



Tague

New York financier Girard L. Spencer, left, was host at one of Tanglewood on Parade's more elaborate spreads, held under a tree for shelter against rain. Martinis in gallon jug also helped.

Symbolic of socializing are cocktail glasses, one in each hand.
